The triumph of "Parsifal" was at once assured, and happily the danger, at one time seriously threatened, of performances at ordinary theatres has up to the present been averted. The titular part was played on Sunday, the 8th ult., by M. van Dyck, who, if not ideal in appearance until after the hero's wanderings, sang and acted throughout with the utmost earnestness, especially distinguishing himself in the scene of temptation in the second act. On the following day there was a contrast, and not for the better. Herr Grüning has sincerity of style, but his vocal method is not pleasant. On the other hand, the new Kundry, Fräulein von Mildenburg, from Hamburg, despite an interesting face and a moderately powerful voice well produced, could not compare with Miss Marie Brema, whose impersonation of Wagner's strange heroine has so far ripened that it is now almost unsurpassable in voice, appearance, and histrionic power. Herr Wachter and Herr Grengg were both acceptable as Gurnemanz on successive days; but Herr Perron was far less persuasive as the suffering Amfortas than his predecessors, Herr Reichmann and Herr Scheidemantel, in this rôle. The not very thankful part of Klingsor was commendably played, as on so many occasions in previous years, by Herr Plank. The important male and female choruses gave evidence of careful rehearsal, and the stage effects, particularly in the panoramic changes, afforded ample evidence that, apart from religious difficulties, "Parsifal" could not be effectively presented in any theatre unprovided with the electric and hydraulic appliances ready to hand at Bayreuth, obviating the necessity for shouting behind the scenes, ringing of bells, and whistling, which prove the reverse of agreeable in London performances of Wagner's masterpieces. No improvement can be expected with us until a stage is erected upon the principles adopted at Bayreuth, where all the latest improvements in mechanism are brought into utilisation. Let it be added that Herr Anton Seidl conducted both the performances of "Parsifal," and once more gave the utmost proofs of his capacity for directing the most advanced works of the Bayreuth master. If, as according to present arrangements, no performances will take place next year, they will certainly be resumed in 1899, when it is hoped that the brothers Jean and Edouard de Reszke will appear.

ALEXANDER WHEELOCK THAYER.

THE great biographer of Beethoven, ALEXANDER WHEELOCK THAYER, died at Trieste, on July 15, having nearly completed his eightieth year.

The name of Thayer will go down to posterity as the author of the "Life of Beethoven," every line of which bears eloquent testimony to his boundless enthusiasm and self-denying energy. Unfortunately, he never completed his great and self-imposed task; but his work is a truly monumental one, deserving the highest praise. Thayer cleared away many erroneous statements made by former Beethoven biographers. He ascertained many important and hitherto unknown facts, and he unearthed numerous unpublished letters. Without being a blind worshipper, he, by dint of the true biographer's love and sympathy, brought the complex and storm-tossed individuality of the master humanly nearer to us than any other writer. For this achievement he has laid the entire musical world under the deepest obligation. His investigations were of the minutest and most painstaking character. He took nothing for granted and neglected nothing which could in any way have some bearing upon his exalted theme; every fact he stated may be regarded as absolutely authentic.

Although an American by birth, and writing his book in English, Thayer was averse to its being issued in that language. The volumes as they were completed were published in Germany, in a German translation by Dr. Deiters, the biographer of Brahms. Here again the author's anxiety to render his work as complete and accurate as possible manifested itself in a striking manner; his reason for the course he adopted being that the German publication would doubtless bring forward well-informed correspondents, and elicit corrections as well as new matter, thus rendering the eventual English version of the work the more complete and reliable. The first volume of "Ludwig van Beethoven's Leben" appeared at Berlin in 1866, the second in 1872, and the third (which brought the life story of the great composer up to the year 1816) in 1879. The most important and eventful period (in regard to creative activity) thus remains to be dealt with—though, alas! by some other hand—in the remaining volume contemplated by the author.

Concerning Thayer's own life, it may be summed up in a few lines. A lineal descendant of the Pilgrim Fathers, he was born at South Natick, near Boston, U.S., on October 22, 1817. He studied at Harvard University, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Laws, and for a few years was employed in the University Library. In 1849 he paid his first visit to Europe, staying about two years, for the purpose of studying German and of collecting material for a life of Beethoven. On his return to Boston he became a highly valued contributor to Dwight's Journal of Music, then but recently started. A severe and able review of Marx's "Beethoven" in the Atlantic Monthly, republished in Germany by Otto Jahn, had made him known in Germany. In 1854 and subsequent years Thayer continued his Beethoven studies in Berlin and Vienna, conferring with Schindler, Wegeler, and other friends of the master. He also visited London, where the help of Charles Neate, Cipriani Potter, George Hogarth, and Chorley was willingly extended to him. In 1862 he was appointed an Attaché of the United States Legation in Vienna, a post which he afterwards exchanged for that of United States Consul at Trieste, where he died. Amongst his minor published writings, besides numerous articles contributed to American newspapers, are "Signor Masona" and "Ein Kritischer Beitrag zur Beethoven Literatur," both published in Berlin. In the pursuit of his life's one great object, Thayer was no stranger to occasional privations, which he bore with heroic fortitude. We may add that at one such period, towards the close of his life, when his failing eyesight would only allow him to work for some two or three hours a day, an offer of material assistance from a firm of London music publishers was conveyed to him in delicate terms through a friend. His reply in declining the offer was at once characteristic and decisive: "If no new misfortune befalls me," he says in his letter, "I think I can continue to live within my income by not leaving Trieste in the summer, and by denying myself all sorts of pleasures and luxuries to which long experience has rendered me habituated." Such was the man. Was he not a true hero-worshipper?

REVIEWS.

British Musical Biography: a Dictionary of Musical Artists, Authors, and Composers, born in Britain and its Colonies. By James D. Brown and Stephen S. Stratton. [Birmingham: S. S. Stratton.]

THE compilers of this latest and, we may safely say, useful and valuable contribution to biographical musical literature are well qualified for their task. Mr. Brown is the author of the useful "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians" which appeared in 1886, and Mr. S. S. Stratton, in addition to being the musical critic of the Birmingham Daily Post, has frequently written interesting articles on musical matters. There can be no question as to the comprehensiveness of this book of 463 pages, printed in double columns. The authors have resolutely kept to the lives of British musicians, so that anyone "made in Germany," even though he had become a naturalised Englishman (or, begging the pardon of our Scotch and Irish friends, a Britisher), would not find admittance into these pages. The first thing that strikes the reader is the very large number of living musicians whose biographies are here recorded. At first sight there appears to be a want of proportion between the space apportioned to the not very eminent living as compared with the illustrious dead; but criticism on this point is somewhat disarmed by the announcement (in the preface) that "the greater masters, already noticed at length in other similar publications, have been treated with brevity in order to afford space for mention of many, if obscure, workers in the cause of Art hitherto passed over by writers of biography."

As to the plan of the book. The authors of necessity have had to present their information in as concise a form as possible, by merely giving dates of birth and death, parentage, sphere of work, appointments, &c., followed by a list of works. We have pleasure in recording the thoroughness with which this has been carried out, whereby the "Biography" becomes indispensable as a book of reference. The selection of names is very comprehensive. It seems somewhat strange to see the names of the "Great Vance" (whose real name was Stevens), Mr. George Leybourne, of "Champagne Charlie" fame (if it can be called fame), and other music-hall singers (or is it "artistes"?) mingled with those of Purcell, Sterndale Bennett, and S. S. Wesley; but here they are. Moreover, as further showing the wide scope of the book, certain amateurs are also included, one of whom combines the occupations of clothier and precentor.

It is inevitable that, in spite of every care and scrutiny, mistakes are bound to creep into pages crowded with a mass of detail. We have noticed a few such errors, one or two of which we may refer to as being important. Goring Thomas was born in 1850, not in 1851, as is wrongly stated nearly everywhere. The late Dr. Henry Wylde started the London Academy of Music in 1861, not in 1871. The excellent primer on "Violin Makers" is by Sir John Stainer's daughter, and not by his son; and to the clever, industrious young lady should be all the praise. The biography of the Rev. Fleetwood Sheppard is, we fear, mixed up with that of the Rev. Edgar Sheppard, the Sub-Dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Argyll Rooms were situated in Regent Street, not in the Strand (p. 189). We should be glad to know the authority for stating that Dr. Blow was really born at Westminster.

In justice to the industrious and painstaking authors of this "Biography," we most sincerely hope that their unwearied labours will meet with due reward. We cordially commend the book—which is published at half-a-guinea—to the consideration of our readers.

Novello's Short Anthems. Nos. 69—87.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Sir John Stainer has certainly enriched this series of Church music by his contributions, which extend from No. 69 to No. 75 inclusive, and are primarily intended for the Advent season. The first of them, entitled "O Wisdom," may be described as a brief and prayerful meditation on the advantages of knowledge, and the nature of the text is admirably reflected in the music, which is written throughout in four parts. No. 70, "O Lord and Ruler," starts with a bold phrase given out in unison by the whole choir, forming an impressive contrast to the supplicating nature of the second section of the anthem. The Finale is particularly effective. "O Root of Jesse" (No. 71) is similar in form and character. No. 72, "O Key of David," also opens with a vigorous unison passage. It makes more demands upon its executants than the two preceding examples, but will well repay any extra care devoted to its study. "O Day-Spring" (No. 73) is remarkable for the grace of its melodiousness. "O King, and Desire of all Nations" (No. 74), is the most extended of the series. It possesses considerable vigour of a reverent kind, and the changes of sentiment are admirably enforced by the music. The conclusion, with the word "come" prolonged pianissimo on the dominant, is deeply impressive. No. 75, "O Emmanuel," is dignified and devotional, and worthily concludes a set which will, doubtless, find wide acceptance during the forthcoming Advent season. Great interest also attaches to the following six numbers, which consist of arrangements for four vocal parts, by Dr. Charles Steggall, of Mendelssohn's six anthems originally written for an eight-part chorus for the Cathedral at Berlin. These works are too well-known to Church musicians to call for detailed description, but it may be said that the chief characteristics of the original form have been carefully preserved in Dr. Steggall's version, and that No. 76 is suitable for Christmas, No. 77 for the beginning of the year, No. 78 for Ascension-tide, Nos. 79 and 81 for the Lenten season, and No. 80 for Advent. "I heard a voice from Heaven" (No. 82) is taken from Dr. G. M. Garrett's first Service in D and is suitable as an introit. "The Lord redeemeth the soul of His servants" (No. 83), by J. Baptiste Calkin, is also derived from a Service in G by its composer. It opens with a brief solo passage for a bass voice, the melody of which is subsequently taken up by the choir in four-part harmony. The next number, "O send out Thy light," is by the same composer and is taken from his Service in B flat. The tenors are divided into two parts in sundry passages and the anthem calls for careful singing, but it will present few difficulties to a fairly experienced choir. No. 85 is an earnest setting, by Thomas Adams, of lines from the first and second verses of the second chapter of the first epistle of St. John. No. 86, "I heard a voice from Heaven," by Alan Gray, is specially suitable for memorial services and is an excellent example of how much variety can be introduced into the somewhat restricted form of this series of anthems. In No. 87, "The steps of a good man," Mr. F. Cambridge has written at greater length, but the work is a simple and cheerful anthem quite in keeping with the spirit of its companions.

The Music of the Poets. A musicians' birthday book. Compiled by Eleonore d'Esterre-Keeling.
[Walter Scott, Limited.]

There is a little known birthday-book story of Rubinstein. The great pianist gave a recital at some provincial English town, at the close of which he repaired to the ante-room and found the table covered with open books. "What are these?" the great Anton asked. "Birthday books for you to sign your name," was the reply, on hearing which he, with one sweep of his arm, hurled them all on to the floor. But we are not all Rubinsteins, and thus we endure the birthday book, even if we are asked by some winsome maiden to "sign our name as usual, so that no one can read it; it's all the more fun." The plan of this attractively got-up book is, under each day of the year, to record the birthday of some eminent musician, or musicians, followed by a poetic quotation or a musical extract from their works, sometimes, as in the natal days of Sir Alexander Mackenzie and Professor Stanford, in fac-simile. The opposite (right hand) page is left blank for the signatures of other celebrities or otherwise. The book, which is dedicated to M. Paderewski and contains twelve full-page portraits of celebrated musicians, is admirably suited for a present or school prize.

Wagner's Ring of the Nibelung, and the conditions of Ideal Manhood. By David Irvine.
[H. Grevel and Co.]

The Epic of Sounds: an Elementary Interpretation of Wagner's Nibelungen Ring. By Freda Winworth.
[Simpkin, Marshall.]

The Wagner literature has already attained to portentous dimensions, and yet there seems to be no diminution of the output. Unlike other great composers, Wagner has provided much material for various writers and commentators wherewith to discourse upon—his music, his literary productions, and his philosophy all being pregnant with profound thoughts. Both the books before us treat of the famous "Ring" in a comprehensive and appreciative manner. Mr. Irvine conveniently divides his volume of nearly 300 pages into the following chapters: "The Problem—The Characters—Biographical—The Drama—The Music." In his opening paragraph the author boldly states that there are some pronounced Wagnerites who are not Wagnerian enough. Here are his words:—"Wagner's Ring of the Nibelung has not yet got beyond the bounds of ignorant, irrelevant criticism. Even from some of the undoubted adherents to the Wagner cause, a sop is thrown to the watch dog of conventional morality when defending the Ring from critics with nothing to lose, no cause to uphold, no genius round whom to gather. It is useless to discuss seriously the import of Wagner's drama with these critics." Those who unfortunately are not "adherents" are told that "Anti-Wagnerism is not troubled with either coherency or consistency. It is like the perpetual tuning of an orchestra, which never begins to play a tune. It is one discordant din." With these specimens of Mr. Irvine's vigorous style those within and those without the fold may be led to study his views on a colossal work of genius. With all due respect to Wagner's greatness, we venture to think that, in the last sentence of his book, our author's hero-worship outruns his discretion. After stating that "Wagner's merit does not lie in having solved the problem of life, but in having stated it," Mr. Irvine adds: "We may be assured that never again will it be stated with such power and beauty." This is a very bold statement to make.

Miss Winworth's book on the same subject is smaller than the foregoing, but none the less welcome on that account. It may truly be designated a "Primer" on the "Ring," so concisely and clearly does our authoress tell the whole story of Wagner's wonderful creation. It is just the kind of résumé that Wagnerian pilgrims to Bayreuth should put into their pockets; and those who stay at home will derive much information from Miss Winworth's succinct and lucid account of a complex work. The book, which is dedicated to "Herrn Siegfried Wagner (with the gracious consent of Frau Cosima Wagner)," is attractively got up and will doubtless find many readers.

The Morning Service. Set to music in the key of F. By A. Davidson Arnott. Op. 15.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. For men's voices. By John E. West.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. By Edward Bunnett.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. ARNOTT'S setting of the Morning Canticles are distinguished by careful observance of verbal accentuation. This is notable in the opening bars, stress being laid on the word "Thee" in the first line of the great Eastern Hymn. The employment of triplets in the section beginning "The glorious company of the Apostles" provides effective contrast to the rhythm previously used, and also gives the appropriate jubilant character to this portion of the hymn. Elsewhere manifest endeavour has been made to illustrate the inner meaning of the words rather than to squeeze the text into strict melodic measure. Similar earnestness of expression characterises the music allied to the Benedictus, This includes a short bass solo. The Amen is set in a florid manner and extends over four pages. It is satisfactory to find that Mr. Arnott has included the Jubilate in his Service, for this Canticle is unduly neglected by composers and clergymen. In this also the Amen is developed at some length and forms an effective Finale. Although the composer has written the voice parts in contrapuntal style and the organ accompaniment with considerable independence, the music will not be found difficult of execution. Mr. West has set the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in what may be termed a direct and straightforward manner for alto, tenor, and first and second bass voices, and the service is likely to prove widely useful. The opening of the Nunc dimittis is a fair example of the good effects to be secured by simple contrapuntal resource. Dr. Bunnett's music to the Evening Canticles is of a kind which this composer has found to be acceptable to many church choirs. It is melodious and simple, and—save for the opening bars of the Magnificat, in which the voices are in unison—is written throughout in four-part harmony of a diatonic character.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Nos. 752—759.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE recent additions to this series are decidedly attractive examples of a form of art in which English composers have long excelled. "Onaway" (No. 752), by Godfrey Pringle, is a love song from Longfellow's "Hiawatha," and its dainty and poetic character is admirably reflected in the music, which, however, calls for a well-trained choir for its due exposition. No. 753 is a re-issue of the late Sir Joseph Barnby's patriotic chorus "Victoria—our Queen," which has deservedly won wide acceptance. In No. 754 will be found, under the title of "Invitation to Mirth," an appropriate and sprightly setting, by Frank Adlam, of Milton's familiar lines beginning "Haste thee, nymph." No. 755 is entitled "The Fortune-teller's Song," the words by Harold Boulton and the music by Eaton Faning. It is a dainty ditty with just the touch of mystery that is appropriate to gipsy prophecy. "Cherry ripe" (No. 757), words by Richard Alison (1606) and music by A. Herbert Brewer, is not the popular ballad, but a lover's flattering comments on the face of his fair one. The quaint spirit of the text has been happily caught by the composer and expressed in music that may be read at sight by singers of average ability. The same composer has supplied No. 758, which is a vivacious setting of Sir Walter Scott's lines, "Waken, lords and ladies gay." At the opening of the final section of this part-song there occurs some ingenious contrapuntal writing well calculated to interest the singers. "Songs of our land" (No. 759) would be specially appropriate at festivals of Irish song. The words are by Frances Brown, and they have been allied by Alicia Adélaïde Needham to music which makes liberal use of the idioms common to Irish melodies. Several well-known ballads of Ireland are deftly introduced, and in its entirety the composition is well designed to appeal to Hibernian sentiment.

Early English Harmony from the 10th to the 15th Century. Illustrated by fac-similes of MSS., with a translation into modern musical notation. Edited by H. E. Wooldridge. Vol I.—Fac-similes.

[Bernard Quaritch.]

THIS handsome and most beautifully printed folio volume is prepared for the members of the Plain Song and Mediæval Music Society. Established early in 1889, this society pursues its unobtrusive course in a highly commendable manner. One of its objects, "To publish fac-similes of important MSS. and such other works as may be desirable," is admirably carried out in the valuable publication now before us. In the preparation of "Early English Harmony" the society has been fortunate in securing the services of so learned an editor as Professor Wooldridge, who, in his preface, says: "The fac-similes in this volume have been selected with the object of showing the practice in England of harmonised, and therefore, except in the case of some of the earliest specimens, measured music, from the 10th century to a period from which the society's 'Songs and Madrigals of the 15th Century' provides examples down to the accession of King Henry VIII." The sixty plates of these excellently reproduced fac-similes contain specimens from the libraries of the British Museum, the Bodleian, Cambridge University; Magdalen College, Oxford; Corpus Christi College, Cambridge; and the Liceo Musicale, Bologna. From the last-named it is interesting to find that the concluding twelve plates are specimens of compositions by the English masters, John Dunstable and John Benet. In the setting of a "Credo" by Dunstable the words "are divided up among the parts, probably with a view to save time in singing such florid music, so that while the treble sings Factorem cœli et terræ, the contra-tenor is singing Et in unum Dominum Jesum Christum, while the tenor part is only vocalised." The second and companion volume of the work, "containing examples in modern notation, will be published about December, 1898." Its appearance will be eagerly looked for.

Hymn Tunes. Composed by Joseph Barnby.

WE cannot do better than introduce this interesting book to our readers than by quoting from the opening words of its preface: "The hymn tunes composed by the late Sir Joseph Barnby have made known his name wherever the English language is spoken. In churches and chapels innumerable, as well as in countless households in Great Britain, the Colonies, and America, these simple and devotional strains have been as wings bearing upwards many a psalm and hymn and spiritual song." Few, if any, will deny the accuracy of this statement. The preface, in describing the contents of the book, then goes on to say: "The following 246 hymn tunes are here gathered together from various sources. They include both sets of his 'Original Tunes to Popular Hymns for use in Church and Home,' in addition to those which he contributed to the Hymnary (of which he was the musical editor) and other collections. Some of the tunes, however, now appear for the first time." There remains nothing more to be said in the way of commendation of Barnby as a hymn-tune composer. To have written 246 tunes is no slight achievement, but when we take into consideration the fine quality of his work and the intense devotional feeling he threw into it, there is no wonder that the great merit of his tunes as "wings of song" has been so universally acknowledged and admired. Such tunes as those to "When morning gilds the skies," "Jesus, my Lord, my God, my all," "For all the Saints," in addition to many others of similar beauty, will long preserve the memory of so gifted a composer of sacred music as Joseph Barnby.

The tunes in this book naturally speak for themselves. Like good wine, they need no bush. But we should like to call the attention of clergymen, organists, and others to the two interesting and characteristic Prefaces contributed by the composer to his "Original Tunes to Popular Hymns for use in Church and Home," which are here reprinted in this attractive volume. The practical usefulness of the book as a "Supplement to all existing Hymnals and Tune-books" is greatly enhanced by copious indices of "first lines" (of hymns) and "names of tunes," in addition to one of "metres." It should find a place in the library of every organist and choirmaster, and those who from time to time have the arranging of music for festival or special services will find it valuable as a book of reference. We predict a wide acceptance of this valuable contribution to sacred song. It will have a cordial welcome not only in the church, but in the home.

The Children's Supplement. Being a collection of Hymns for Children's Services (with tunes). Edited by the Rev. Edward Handley, M.A.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Children's hymnals were formerly a mixture of pietistical doggerel and rhythmically vulgar music. The species is not yet extinct, but there has been a marked improvement in the quality of the music in recent publications, of which the book before us is a highly favourable example. It is by no means an easy thing to write a satisfactory children's hymn-tune. Even a successful composer may lack the necessary sympathy with child life. An attractive, diatonic, and rhythmic melody of natural compass is absolutely necessary. Moreover, it is often more effective as a unison melody than in four parts. For example, the earliest form of Gauntlett's popular tune to "Once in Royal David's city" was that of a melody with simple chordal accompaniment; but the galivanting under parts of the harmonised version destroys the delicate tenderness of the original. The book under review has been planned on the right lines and is much to be commended. Typical specimens of what a child's tune should be are the unison tunes Nos. 19 and 8, by Sir John Stainer and Mr. Myles B. Foster. Other capable composers, in contributing original tunes, have seconded the labours of the editor in producing a Supplement to existing hymnals which should find a ready and wide acceptance. Three "Forms of Service for use in Church" are given at the end of the book.

The Office for the Holy Communion. Set to music in the key of A. By the Rev. James Baden Powell, Precentor of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The music of this service is for the most part diatonic; in one passage (pp. 7 and 8) there are chromatic harmonies which offer striking contrast. The writing generally may not be very profound—for practical purposes, indeed, this would not be suitable—but it is smooth and appropriate to the words. Wagner has been censured for the preponderance of even measure in his "Lohengrin," and the same charge may be brought against Mr. Baden Powell; he sins, however—if sin it be—in good company.

Antonin Dvorák is said to be engaged upon a new opera on the subject of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which is to be first brought out in the United States.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The term-end students' musical evening at the Norfolk and Norwich School of Music, on July 30, proved the best exhibition of talent which the directors have placed before their friends since the formation of the school. Progress was evident, not only in the intelligence shown by the students, but by the greater range of instruments represented in the programme, proving that the school is increasing in usefulness and becoming a centre from which musical culture will radiate.

The Silver Medal presented by Mr. J. Moore, Deputy-Mayor of Norwich, for proficiency and finished style in singing, was won by Miss Amy Howitt, Miss Florence Sendall and Mr. H. J. Luckett being honourably mentioned. The Bates' Scholarship, which entitles the winner to a year's free tuition in singing under Dr. Bates, fell to Miss Evelyn Best, honourable mention being awarded to Miss Kate Moore and Mr. H. J. Luckett. The medal and certificates were handed to the winners by the Mayoress (Lady Gilman) amidst much applause.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Glasgow Choral Union arrangements for the coming season are well in hand. Most appropriately our premier society will again be heard in the Cathedral, where Spohr's "Last Judgment" and selections from Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" will be performed on the afternoon of October 2. Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion music will be repeated in the venerable pile next Easter. During the winter the society will give Berlioz's "Faust" and Acts I. and III. of Wagner's "Lohengrin," in conjunction with the Scottish Orchestra. The customary New Year's Day performance of Handel's "The Messiah" is, of course, fixed, and amongst the vocalists who are engaged will be found the names of Miss Ella Russell, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Daniel Price, and Mr. Atherton Smith, a young artist who hails from Glasgow and who has lately been studying in Paris and with Mr. Santley in London.

The Scottish Orchestra Company's concerts begin on November 30, the season is to extend to nine weeks, and Mr. Kes returns as conductor.

The Corporation of Glasgow inaugurated a short series of organ recitals on the afternoon of the 11th ult. Mr. Thomas Berry played on the St. Andrew's Hall organ and Mr. J. K. Strachan presided at the City Hall instrument, the mechanism of which is somewhat out of date. These recitals were entirely experimental, and their continuance will naturally depend upon the support accorded to the scheme. The organists on the 18th ult. were to be Dr. E. H. Middleton and Mr. Harold Ryder.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Information solicited from the secretary of the Philharmonic Society as to the programme for the coming season has resulted in the bare announcement of one solitary novelty—to wit, Elgar's "King Olaf." With the exception of the usual performance of "The Messiah," no mention is made in the syllabus of other works, either instrumental or choral.

The directorate of the Winter Evenings Entertainments are carrying forward to a considerable extent the ideas of the late G. B. Rodway, who established these important factors in our artistic life two or three years ago. This season, however, the scheme is deficient of its former attractions in the direction of the highest class orchestral music.

For the Sunday Society's concerts the small as well as the large concert-room in St. George's Hall have been granted by the Corporation of Liverpool. Owing to the action of the Musicians' Union in regard to fees, the customary number of orchestral concerts has been reduced from twelve to six. Whether those chiefly concerned in the agitation will be gratified by the result is a moot point. The area of the large hall necessitates a band of considerable dimensions, and the fact that the directorate of the society are not allowed to charge for admission, but have to abide by voluntary donations, naturally cramps their resources. And so, in view of the agitation which has been not very pleasantly forced under their notice for two years past, the gentlemen who have, without any financial reward, carried on the movement have come to the only possible conclusion. Last year they shared about £280 among the band, and for the coming season £160 only is to be spent on this branch of the service, the bulk of the balance going into the pockets of the inevitable vocal "star." It is all a pity.

It is pleasant to turn to the scheme of the Liverpool Orchestral Society, which, though not yet complete, places well in evidence the brightness of the light to be kept burning by Mr. Rodewald and his colleagues. This fine band is to be of, at least, the same proportions as before, its ranks including not less than one hundred players, and there are to be six orchestral concerts as well as one of chamber music. The symphonies to be given are Beethoven's fourth and fifth in B flat and C minor, Dvorák's third and fourth in D and G, Brahms's second in D, and Mozart's in E flat. Tschaïkowsky's "Mozartiana" Suite and that in G, some important Wagner excerpts, and Gluck's Ballet Suite, orchestrated by Mottl, are also included in the scheme.

So far no announcements are to hand regarding the doings of the Musical or other choral societies, but, as often before remarked, the second city is unfortunately always far behind in regard to this side of art.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

The musical interest here, for some weeks past, centred in the annual concours of the Conservatoire, the proceedings of which are always fully reported in the press, and many columns devoted to them in musical and dramatic journals. They terminated on the 6th ult. with the distribution of prizes to successful pupils, amongst them Mdlle. Ackté, who obtained the first prize for operatic singing. In the unavoidable absence of both the Minister of Public Instruction and the Director of Fine Arts, M. Georges Berger, the deputy of the Seine district, presided and delivered the customary discourse, the ceremony concluding with a concert performance in which the principal prize winners took part. M. Raoul Pugno, the eminent pianist, has been nominated a chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and a similar distinction has been conferred upon M. Albert Lavignac, professor of harmony at the Conservatoire. As regards the historical concert hall—famous for its excellent acoustic properties—of that Institution, it has now been definitely decided by the authorities to close it, on the ground of its affording insufficient security to the public in case of fire, and the Concerts du Conservatoire, which have been in existence now for sixty-eight years, will be given in the coming season at the Opéra. For this purpose, both the orchestral and choral forces of the Société des Concerts will have to be proportionately increased, while the younger institution, known as the Concerts de l'Opéra, which could not of course hope to compete with the Conservatoire, will cease to exist.

The Lamoureux Concerts, too, as already indicated in our last month's issue, are threatened with extinction. In a letter recently published in the Temps, the eminent and popular conductor reiterates his decision not to resume the concerts in the coming season in order to gain a free hand for the elaboration of his other projects, while expressing a hope that his excellent orchestral body may be able to procure another congenial conductor, and that the concerts, founded in 1881, and subventioned by the Government, may thus continue their prosperous course. It is just possible, however, as another letter subsequently published in the Echo de Paris seems to imply, that a middle course may yet be found, and that M. Lamoureux may not find it necessary to sever his connection altogether from the excellent institution of which he is the founder.

At the Opéra, "Samson et Dalila," "Faust," "Don Giovanni," and "Lohengrin" have alternated during last month. Rehearsals of "Die Meistersinger" are being most actively pushed forward here; seventy new choristers have been engaged for the important choral portions of the work, and M. Rissler, the distinguished pianist, has been summoned from Bayreuth to assist in their training. It is hoped that the first Paris performance of Wagner's only comic opera will take place in the first week of November. It will be followed later on by the reprise of M. Massenet's "Thaïs," and a revival of "Guillaume Tell" and "Le Prophète" (the new scenery for which is all but completed) may also be expected. Mdlle. Ackté, who, as stated, gained a first prize at the Conservatoire this year, will probably make her début at the Opéra (where she has already been engaged for some little time) in the part of Marguerite in "Faust."

The new opera, "Le Spahi," by M. Lucien Lambert, is in course of preparation at the Opéra Comique, where it is to be brought out on October 15, and M. Massenet's "Sapho" will follow about a month later. M. Carvalho has engaged MM. Vieuille and Dumontier, both of whom gained first prizes at this year's concours, for the forthcoming season, as well as M. Ghasne, a successful baritone of the Brussels Théâtre de la Monnaie.

M. Saint-Saëns has been occupied, during his holidays, with the composition of a grand scena, entitled "Cléopâtre à Rome," with which either the Conservatoire or the Colonne Concerts will doubtless ere long make us acquainted. The artist started, on the 16th ult., for Sweden, for the purpose of conducting two concert performances of his own compositions at Stockholm, and afterwards giving a series of organ recitals in the principal Scandinavian towns.

An interesting musical function took place on the 13th ult., at the Church of Saint Nicolas-du-Chardonnet, in connection with the "opening" of the renovated and partly reconstructed organ of this church, when quite a number of highly esteemed organists in the capital, MM. Dallier, d'Aubel, Decq, Minard, and Berçot, played on the practically new instrument and displayed its truly excellent qualities, both of sonority and mechanism, to the very best advantage.

A new edition of Félix Clément's "Dictionnaire Lyrique," edited by M. Arthur Pougin, has just been published by the Librairie Larousse. This important book of reference, the last supplement to which appeared as long ago as 1880, has, in the present edition, been entirely brought up to date, and a vast amount of new matter added to it by its industrious editor.

A concert by students of the London Academy of Music, at St. George's Hall, on July 24, brought forward quite the average amount of ability expected at displays of this description. In several instances proof was afforded of natural qualifications having received careful development. Balance between instrumental and vocal pieces was pretty evenly maintained, both with respect to the number and the efficiency with which they were executed. As pianists Miss Maude Smithers and Miss Rosalind Borowski earned approval for their smooth and artistic rendering of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor and a "Valse Romantique" respectively. There were also a couple of solo violinists. Miss Evelyn Tyser played Vieuxtemps's "Air Varié" with firmness and feeling, and Miss Zeta Mason acquitted herself satisfactorily in one of the Brahms-Joachim Hungarian dances and an air by Bach. Among the vocalists, Miss Alice Tristram (with a refined rendering of Goring Thomas's "A Summer Night"), Mr. Gilbert Denis (who sympathetically sang Willeby's "Wake not"), and Miss Mary Hulburd (in her tasteful singing of "Connais-tu le Pays," from Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon") were prominent. Some variations on a string quartet by Beethoven, an Andante Religioso for strings by Hiller, and other pieces, effectively played by the orchestral force conducted by Mr. A. Pollitzer, varied a programme which concluded with the presentation of diplomas and medals gained at the recent examinations.

At Trinity College, London, Professor E. H. Turpin, on July 28, distributed the diplomas and certificates gained at the forty-eighth half-yearly higher examinations. Among the examiners who attended were Professors James Higgs and Bradbury Turner. Of the 216 candidates, including 123 pianoforte students, examined, ninety-six passed. As licentiates in music Mr. Frederick Royle, of Durham University, and Mr. Herbert Westerby, of Trinity College, London, took their diplomas, and eighteen persons from different parts of the United Kingdom and from Sydney, N.S.W., were awarded diplomas as associates in music. In the course of a brief address to the students Professor Turpin said all good work must be thorough. In these days of high pressure pupils were often tempted to go forward without allowing themselves sufficient time for the preparation absolutely necessary to ensure success. Time also was required to conquer technicalities, but excellence in technicalities was not enough. They would do well to remember that everything they wrote and everything they played should be characterised by elevation and emotion. They should also study melody. To know music better they must look at it more closely, think for themselves, and do all in their power to become proficient in the art they loved.

THE fourth annual brass band contest, under the auspices of the Stratford Musical Festival, was held at The Cedars, Portway, West Ham Park, on the 14th ult., and was attended by about 3,000 people. There were two contests, the Essex Brass Band Championship and the Southern Counties Brass Band Championship. In the former eight entries had been received, and the selected piece was "Gems of Victorian Melody." The result was as follows: Walthamstow Silver Band, 1; Walthamstow and Leyton District Temperance Prize Band, 2; and Thames Ironworks Military Band, 3. There were five competitors for the Southern County Championship, the test piece being a selection from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The first prize went to the Luton Red Cross Band, the second to Fulham Borough Band, and the third to St. Alban's Abbey Band. Mr. George John Miller, Bandmaster of the Royal Marine Light Infantry (Portsmouth Division), was the adjudicator; and, in announcing his decision, he urged conductors to confine themselves strictly to the tempo marked in the music, and not "to play to the gallery," a remark which was received with loud applause.

WE understand that several important changes have been made in the band for Mr. Robert Newman's promenade concerts at Queen's Hall. No less than thirty new players have been introduced, to the displacement, we presume, of thirty of the old personnel. The following is a complete list of the various principals: First violin, Arthur W. Payne; second violin, W. H. Eayres; violas, Mr. Ferrier; violoncello, W. H. Squire; basses, J. H. Waud; flute, A. Fransella; oboe, D. Lalande; clarinet, M. Gomez; bassoon, E. F. James; cornet, Howard Reynolds; trumpet, W. Morrow; horn, A. Borsdorf; trombone, T. Colton; tuba and euphonium, Walter Reynolds, of Kettering; tympani, C. Henderson; harp, Miss Miriam Timothy; glockenspiel, J. Schroeder. Mr. Percy Pitt will be organist and accompanist as before. Mr. Henry J. Wood, who will of course conduct, intends to have no programme without some work by a native composer, and he hopes to repeat many of the compositions by British musicians which he originally produced. This is good news. Other conductors, "please copy."

THE Brussels Société Symphonique, under M. Ysaye's direction, is arranging for a series of concerts devoted to the compositions of various nations, and forming a kind of musical exposition by the side of the International Exhibition now in progress in the Belgian capital. The series will comprise seven concerts—viz., one of Belgian music, conducted by M. Léon Jehin; two of German music, under Herr Mottl's direction; an English one, conducted by Professor C. Villiers Stanford; one of Scandinavian music, under Herr Johann Svendsen; one of Italian music, under Signor Martucci; and a French concert, under the direction of M. Vincent d'Indy. Amongst the artists taking part will be Mesdames Mottl, Gulbranson, Marie Brema, Messrs. Leonard Borwick, Plunket Greene, Francis Planté, and M. Ysaye. The first performance of the series, devoted to Belgian composers, will take place on October 24.

THE Musical Society of Victoria sends us a very satisfactory "Report and Balance-sheet for the year ending April 30, 1897." This enterprising society, now five years old, holds the position of "Examiners to the Education Department of the Colony." Of the eighty-seven candidates who presented themselves for examination, forty-eight "passed." There is a benevolent fund and a lending library in connection with the society, and a list of chamber works performed at the general meetings shows that good music is cultivated at the Antipodes. The papers read included a review of Mr. Shedlock's "History of the Pianoforte Sonata," one on "Idiosyncrasy," and another, of a more controversial character, entitled "Critics at fault!" Substantial credit balances testify to the financial prosperity of the society, which has our best wishes for its future prosperity.

A SERIES of daily normal classes for the training of conductors of church choirs, choral societies, orchestral bands, school choirs, &c., under the auspices of the Tonic Sol-fa College, have been held during the past month in London. The students, who attended from all parts, in many cases held scholarships, and the aim has been to give them practical knowledge in teaching music to children and beginners, and in wielding the baton. Harmony and composition, as well as voice culture and elocution, were also studied. The professors included Mr. George Oakey, Dr. McNaught, Mr. L. C. Venables, Mr. Filmer Rook, Mr. Carrington Willis, Mr. W. T. Samuel (of Swansea), Dr. Coward (of Sheffield), and Mr. W. H. Bonner. Mr. J. S. Curwen and Mr. R. Griffiths, President and Secretary of the College, acted as superintendents.

THE twenty-fourth annual festival of the London Church Choir Association will be held on November 18 in St. Paul's Cathedral. The musical arrangements are under the direction of Sir George C. Martin, organist of St. Paul's and hon. conductor of the Association. The anthem will be Sir John Stainer's "Lord, Thou art God," and at the conclusion of the service Sir George Martin's Jubilee Te Deum will be sung. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis will be Field in D, and the chants and hymn tunes by well-known composers. Owing to ill-health Mr. Harold Wall has been obliged to relinquish the duties of honorary secretary, and at the annual meeting of the Association, held at the Chapter House, St. Paul's Churchyard, on July 22, Mr. W. R. B. Tann was elected to fill the vacancy.

DR. FRANK N. ABERNETHY, whose name has been so prominently before the public in connection with the organ appointment at St. Saviour's, Southwark, was, on July 29, the recipient of a testimonial from a large number of parishioners and friends, amongst the subscribers being Sir John Stainer. Dr. Herron, in presenting Dr. Abernethy with an illuminated address and purse of money, asked him to accept them as tokens of the deep feeling they (the subscribers) had towards him, as well as an expression of their resentment at the treatment he had received at the hands of the clerical authorities, who had deprived them of a friend and the church of one of its most distinguished members. The wardens of the church had previously given Dr. Abernethy one hundred guineas.

THE Beethoven House Society, of Bonn, proposes to distribute the proceeds of the recent Beethoven festival in the form of three prizes, of 2,000 marks each, for new chamber compositions — viz., one for stringed instruments only, another for stringed instruments with pianoforte, and a third for wind instruments only or for wind instruments with either pianoforte or stringed instruments. Competitors must have been born previous to 1876 and their MSS. (score and parts) should be sent not later than December 17 next, addressed to Professor Joachim, in Berlin. Professors Rheinberger, of Munich; Von Herzogenberg and Joachim, of Berlin; Drs. Reinecke, of Leipzig; Wolff, of Bonn; and Mandyczewski, of Vienna, are the members of the jury.

AT the recent annual meeting of the Church Orchestral Society, held in the Church House, Professor Sir Frederick Bridge, who presided, drew attention to the remarkable progress made by the society during the past year, a progress which was clearly indicated by the great number of applications which had been sent in for the use of the band. The chairman further said that he put a high value upon the work taken up by the society, and predicted for it an important and permanent position amongst Church organisations. It may be added that special precautions are taken to ensure devout as well as artistic treatment of the services in which the society's band takes part.

At the conclusion of the Midsummer Term of the Royal College of Music the following exhibitions and prizes were awarded: Council Exhibitions, Alice M. Hodder, £15 (singing); Archie F. Barnes, £5 (organ); Morfydd Williams, £10 (singing); Gertrude Lester, £10 (violin); Edith Stapley, £10 (violin). The London Musical Society's prize (value £3 3s.) was awarded to Agnes H. Nicholls, and the Silvani and Smith prize, of a wind instrument, to Eli R. Hudson (flute). The Whitcombe Portsmouth Close scholarship was awarded, after competition, to Beatrice E. Chambers (pianoforte).

Madame Ellinor gave a concert in aid of the Prince of Wales's Hospital Fund, at Steinway Hall, on July 23, under the patronage of Prince and Princess Christian. Madame Ellinor played, with Mr. Gallrein, Rubinstein's Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello, and several pianoforte solos by Liszt and Chopin, all of which were well received. The programme was supported by Madame Kate Cove, Mdlle. Douste de Fortis, Mr. Josef Claus, Mr. A. H. Gee (vocalists), Mr. Gallrein (violoncellist), Mr. G. T. Miles (harpist), and Mr. Stanley Hawley (accompanist).

Sir Arthur Sullivan has forwarded to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales a cheque for £202, representing the sum paid by Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode in respect of royalty on the sales of the late Bishop of Wakefield's Jubilee Hymn, of which the copyright had been assigned to him by the author. Sir Arthur Sullivan, in making this generous donation, expressed a wish that it should be considered a joint gift from the late Bishop of Wakefield and himself, as their share of the proceeds of the Jubilee Hymn.

Mr. F. Cunningham Woods, music-master at Highgate School, has been appointed conductor of the Finsbury Choral Association in succession to Mr. Cecil Sharp, who has resigned. The committee of this important and energetic society have decided to give during the coming season the following works: "The Messiah," "Elijah," Gounod's "Faust," and Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon." Such an enterprising programme will doubtless be well carried out under the able direction of the new conductor.

Mr. N. Vert, the well-known concert agent, announces that he has already made the following fixtures for the coming season. At St. James's Hall: his own three grand morning concerts, on October 16, 23, and 30. At Queen's Hall: two Richter concerts, on October 18 and 25; a Scotch concert, on November 30 (St. Andrew's Day); and Mr. Willy Hess's Quartet concert, on December 8. The dates of Herr Grieg's recital at St. James's Hall and the Bach Choir concerts have yet to be fixed.

The prospectus of the Royal Choral Society for the approaching season is not yet ready for publication; but we are enabled to state that, in addition to the usual familiar and popular works, the novelties, or pseudo-novelties, will include Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," adapted to a new English version, and a new oratorio, entitled "The Gate of Life," by Franco Leoni, which will be its first performance. Sir Frederick Bridge's "Flag of England" will be repeated "by desire."

The Normal or Teachers' course of the Virgil Piano School, which has just closed (28th ult.), has been eminently successful, about eighty pianoforte teachers having attended the session. An interesting and enjoyable feature of the course has been the playing of Herr Felix Dreyschock, of Berlin, who has given twelve "Recital Lessons" during the session. We understand that a two weeks' teachers' course will be held during the Christmas holidays.

The fourteenth annual report of the Royal College of Music, which has recently been issued, records a year of "continued and steady progress." There are now 347 students on the register—viz., 61 scholars receiving free musical education and 286 paying pupils. Several additions to the library are acknowledged. We hope that the authorities will soon see their way to allow accredited students to have access to this valuable library.

The balance-sheet for the fourth season of the Bridlington Musical Society—in other words, the Bridlington Festival—for this year shows a deficit of £88 13s. 6d. This, however, has been kindly defrayed by Mr. Bosville, the enthusiastic founder and conductor of the festival. Bridlington is doubtless the envy of many other towns in possessing so cultured and generous a benefactor.

Justizrath Röntsch, of Leipzig, has sent the following communication to the German press: "In the name of the heirs of the late Frau Dr. Clara Schumann, I hereby give notice that they reserve to themselves all proprietary rights in the works of the deceased, more especially with regard to her letters, in accordance with the law promulgated July 11, 1870."

Mr. Andrew MacCunn, a talented young musician now in his seventeenth year, has been appointed organist and choirmaster of the Free Mid Church, Greenock, where a new organ, to cost £1,000, is now being erected by Messrs. Henry Willis and Sons. Mr. Andrew MacCunn is a brother of Mr. Hamish MacCunn.

Madame Vestella Gordon, the soprano vocalist, well known in musical circles of the metropolis, has just returned from a very successful concert tour in the leading towns of Holland, in company with several Italian and French artists, under the direction of the impresario M. Ferdinand Strakosch.

Her Majesty the Queen conferred the honour of Knighthood on Professor John Frederick Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey, on the 3rd ult., and on Dr. George Clement Martin, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 18th ult., both functions taking place at Osborne.

Mr. Frederick Lamond, the gifted Scottish pianist, has been offered a professorship at the Moscow Conservatoire, under very favourable conditions, but has declined the appointment. Mr. Lamond is just now residing at Frankfort-on-Main.

The Dean and Chapter of Worcester have appointed Mr. Ivor Atkins organist of Worcester Cathedral. Mr. Atkins was formerly assistant-organist of Hereford Cathedral and is at present organist of Ludlow Parish Church.

Mr. Bingley Shaw, during his recent concert tour in South Africa, has visited all the principal towns in Cape Colony, Natal, Orange Free State, the Transvaal, &c., where he has had much success as a bass vocalist.

Dr. Philip Armes, Professor of Music at Durham University, asks us to call the attention of those who are interested in the matter to the amended conditions of the Exercise for the degree of Bachelor of Music.

The well-known pianoforte firm of Messrs. Steinway and Sons has been converted into a limited liability company, with a nominal capital of a million and a quarter.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—With a view to the approaching coronation of Queen Wilhelmina, a prize competition has been opened to native composers by the Society "tot Verbetering van Volkszang" for the composition of a Coronation Hymn. The leading musicians of Holland, Richard Hol, Daniel de Lange, and B. Zweers, constitute the jury.——A six months' season of Italian opera, by a company under the direction of Signor Vincenzo Morghen, is about to commence here, with alternate performances given at The Hague. The repertory will consist chiefly of works by modern Italian composers. Signor Mascagni has been engaged to personally conduct his operas, "Ratcliff," "I Rantzau," and "Amico Fritz," and amongst the artists engaged were Signoras Bellincioni and Prevostini and Signor Tamagno.

Bayreuth.—At the general meeting of the German Wagner Society, held here on July 21, the president stated that there had been a reduction in the membership by 1,000 during the last twelve months. A motion proposing the dissolution of the society was negatived by a large majority, but a committee was appointed to consider the advisability of modifying its statutes.

Berlin.—A new acting version of the second part of Goethe's "Faust," by Herr Aloys Prasch, is being mounted with much care at the Berliner Theater, and the coming event is looked forward to with much interest here. A special feature of the performance will be the new incidental music written for the occasion by Herr Max Karpa, the talented conductor of the theatre, who has followed very closely in his score the hints and indications furnished by the poet himself in letters to his friends and in his conversations with Eckermann.——A new work, which cannot fail to excite much curiosity and interest, is about to be submitted to leading German operatic managers. It is nothing less than a dramatised version, set to music, of Immermann's "Münchhausen"; not, indeed, the idyl, entitled "Der Oberhof," which forms so charming an episode in that famous novel, but the politico-social satire itself, with that arch-humbug Münchhausen, somewhat brought up to date, for its central figure. The authors of the new work, who carefully conceal their identity under the pseudonym of Hans Ferdinand Hans, are said to occupy prominent positions in the literary and musical world.——At the Royal Opera a young soprano, Fräulein Reinisch, engaged last year pending the completion of her studies, made an excellent début recently in "Les Huguenots," and will, in the opinion of many competent critics, soon attain a prominent position.—— The Meyerbeer Prize of 5,000 marks has this year been awarded to Herr Bernhard Koehler, a pupil of the Cologne Conservatorium.—— Madame Carreño, the well-known pianist, has returned to her residence here after a tour in the United States of two months, during which she gave no less than sixty recitals.

Brussels.—The first performance of M. Edgar Tinel's drame musicale "Sainte Godelive," the libretto by Hilda Ram, took place in the concert hall of the Exhibition, before a numerous audience, on July 22. The new work by the composer of "Franciscus" is intended both for the concert-room and for stage representation, and embodies some effective dramatic writing together with general excellency of workmanship. It proved, however, to be somewhat of a disappointment to the musicians present, being considered wanting in style and personality. The defective acoustic conditions of the hall, moreover, prevented its being heard to the best advantage. The composer, who conducted, was accorded a most hearty reception. A second performance had been announced in the following week, but was countermanded.——Performances at the Théâtre de la Monnaie will be resumed on the 1st inst., among the principal works to be produced during the season being M. Massenet's "Hérodiade," MM. Zola and Bruneau's "Messidor," and Wagner's "Die Walküre" and "Die Meistersinger." Among the artists announced to appear during the season are Miss Brema, who will be the Marceline in "L'Attaque du Moulin," Frau Mottl (Elsa in "Lohengrin," Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser," and Marguerite in "Faust"), and M. van Dyck.——M. Paul Gilson, the composer, a former laureate at the Conservatoire, has gained the prize for a poem to be set to music by this year's candidates for the Belgian Prix de Rome. The professional librettists who competed with the musician are said to be furious, vowing that they will take their revenge by entering the ranks of composers at the next competition!——Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was performed for the first time in the Belgian capital on the 8th ult., at the Exhibition Hall, by the "Legia" Choral Society of Liège, under the direction of M. Sylvain Dupuis, with Mdlles. Nathan and Haas, Herren Dierich and Sistermans—all well-reputed German artists—in the important solo parts. The performance was an event in the musical life of Brussels and created a profound impression. An interesting analytical study of the work, from the pen of M. Marcel Rémy, has been published in connection with the performance.

Coburg.—The house in which the amiable composer of comic opera, Lortzing, resided for some years (when a boy) with his parents, has, after some difficulty, been ascertained, and a commemorative tablet has been affixed to it. The fact of the interest taken in so comparatively slight a matter sufficiently testifies to the great popularity still enjoyed by this composer in the fatherland.

Cologne.—At one of the popular concerts at the Gürzenich Hall last month, a new symphonic poem, "The Corsair," by Herr Franz Kessel, attracted the attention of connoisseurs by its imaginative qualities, characteristic themes, and brilliant colouring. The composer was greatly applauded.——The Stadt-Theater celebrates the twenty-fifth anniversary of its existence this month.

Dresden.—Herr Felix Draeseke, the well-known composer, is engaged upon the score of an important work—viz., an oratorio in three parts, entitled "Christus," with a view to its first performance at the opening of the new century. The work is to be a monumental one of grand proportions, and will, it is anticipated, gain for its composer that general recognition by his countrymen which he has hitherto lacked. A committee has already been formed to arrange for the preliminaries of the performance.

Drontheim.—On the occasion of the recent 900th anniversary of the foundation of this town the celebrations included the highly successful performance of an oratorio, written for the occasion by the Norwegian composer, Ole Olsen.

Gotha.—The diet of the principality, in granting its annual subvention to the Court Theatre, has imposed the following condition upon the directors: that in the course of the season at least seven performances shall be given at popular prices—viz., 40 pfennig, or about 4½d. each.

Kiel.—Hans Pfitzner's remarkable opera "Der arme Heinrich," already successfully produced at Mayence and Carlsruhe, is to be brought out next month at the Stadt-Theater.

Leipzig.—At the seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the University Choral Society, which was celebrated from July 19 to 21, two interesting and highly successful concert performances were given, under the direction of Herr Heinrich Zöllner, of New York, Dr. Kretzschmar, the conductor of the society, being unfortunately incapacitated by illness. The first concert, of sacred music, took place at St. Thomas's Church, and included choral numbers by Palestrina, Orlando Lassus, Volkmann, and Kretzschmar. Herr Paul Gerhardt, the excellent organist, who throughout was the accompanist, also played the D minor Toccata and Fugue by Bach and the A minor Sonata by Ritter in a masterly manner. The second concert, of secular music, took place at the Gewandhaus, and was devoted for the greater part to the compositions of honorary members, past and present, of the Society, including Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, Max Bruch, Kretzschmar, and Carl Reinecke, the latter represented by a chorus with orchestra, "Der deutsche Sang," specially written for this occasion. Fräulein Clotilde Kleeberg was the pianist, and Herr Lederer, of Zürich, the solo vocalist.

Marienbad.—At a concert of the Curcapelle, under the direction of Capellmeister Schreyer, complete success was attained by Herr Carl Hess's overture to "Romeo and Juliet."

Mayence.—As an outcome of the recent successful Handel festival, a scheme is now being discussed by the representatives of the Liedertafel and Damen Gesangverein for the institution of an annual people's festival, at which some great choral work by one of the classic composers (not necessarily Handel) is to be performed. The charge for admission is to be a nominal one, the idea being to attract the poorer members of the community; and with characteristic Teutonic idealism and thoroughness, a lecture is to be delivered on the day preceding the performance relative to the history and characteristics of the work to be produced.

Moscow.—The veteran Chevalier de Kontski, to whose extensive concert tour in Japan and China we made reference some time since, has recently given three concerts at Vladivostok with enormous success, and is now continuing his tour in the principal towns of Siberia. The Chevalier, who will be an octogenarian next month, was formerly well known to English amateurs.

Munich.—Performances at the Royal Theatre were resumed on the 1st ult. with an excellent representation of "Lohengrin." During the brief recess the house had been completely redecorated, and presented a magnificent appearance, many improvements for the convenience of the audience having likewise been effected. The Intendant of the Royal Theatre, Herr von Possart, is about to establish a school of scenic painting in connection with that institution, and has secured for this purpose the services of the celebrated painters Lenbach and Seitz, and of the sculptor F. von Miller. This will probably be the first school of its kind ever established, and cannot fail to produce excellent results.

Pampeluna.—Señor Sarasate, the eminent violinist, has presented to this, his native town, his valuable and interesting collection of works of art and other objects of intrinsic value. Amongst them are gifts bestowed upon him by the late Emperor Napoleon, the Empress Augusta, and other royal personages. The collection is to form the nucleus of a museum for the town.

Prague.—A new ballet in three acts, entitled "Bayaya," in which some original Czech melodies have been very happily introduced, was brought out with much success on July 20 at the National Theatre. The composer is M. Henry de Kaan, a professor of the pianoforte at the Prague Conservatoire.

Rome.—Rumour, which at this season of the year usually represents Verdi as being actively engaged upon a new comic opera, is taking a somewhat more serious turn this year. Thus, if we are to credit the Resto del Carlino, the veteran Maëstro—who is taking the waters at Montecatini—has completed a new Te Deum, and is now engaged upon a Requiem, which he is writing for himself.——A "Society of St. Gregory the Great" has been formed here, having for its object the reform of church music in Italy, the tendencies of which are considered to be too palpably theatrical.——Teresina Tua (Countess Franchi-Verney), the eminent violinist, a former pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, has been nominated an officer of the French Academy.

St. Petersburg.—In honour of the late visit here of their German Majesties, a special performance was given in the charming open-air theatre surrounded by magnificent trees, and with natural scenery for its background, which the Emperor Nicolaus I. had caused to be designed on Olga Island, at Peterhof, but which, owing to the severity of the climate, is but rarely used. The performance consisted of a ballet, "L'Union de Thétis avec Pelée," specially compiled for the occasion by the superintendent of the Imperial Theatres, M. Vsevolosky, and M. Mincus, the official composer of ballets. It was superbly mounted by the aid of both nature and art, and produced a fairy-like effect upon the five hundred privileged persons who witnessed the spectacle.

Scheveningen.—A very successful concert in commemoration of Johannes Brahms was given on the 8th ult., at the Curhaus, in which Professor Heermann, of Frankfort, and Mdlle. Jeanne Blyenburg, a talented vocalist, took part. Baron van Zuylen-Nyevelt, a noted amateur, conducted the orchestra.

Trieste.—The Teatro Communale, which has been closed for several seasons, will re-open its doors in the autumn under the experienced management of Signori Fidora and Cesari. A brilliant season is anticipated, with Goldmark's "Die Königin von Saba," Verdi's "Falstaff," Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Götterdämmerung" in the répertoire.

Venice.—Much interest is taken here in the projected performance, by the aid of a committee formed for the purpose, of two operas, entitled respectively "Teilo l'Africano" and "Aldino di Cittadella," written by a labourer employed in the arsenal, Luigi Cocola by name. This young man is entirely self-taught, and his exceptional talent has attracted the attention of musicians for some time past.

Verviers.—The Municipal Council have voted the sum of 10,000 francs towards the monument to be erected to Vieuxtemps, the eminent violinist.

Vienna.—The performances of the Imperial Opera were resumed on the 1st ult., "Lohengrin" being given with an excellent cast, including Herr Winkelmann and Mesdames von Ehrenstein and Kaulich, the latter, in the part of Ortrud, being especially applauded. Herr Mahler was the conductor. —— Herr A. Weirich, of the Church of the Dominicans, has been appointed Capellmeister of the Hofburg Parochial Church, in the room of the late Franz Krenn.——According to the annual report of the Conservatorium of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, that excellent institution was frequented during the past academical year by 901 pupils, 763 of whom appertained to Austria-Hungary, the remainder being natives of other countries, including six from the United States.

OBITUARY.

Mr. William Smallwood, well-known as a composer of pianoforte pieces for teaching and the drawing-room, died on the 6th ult., at Kendal, where he was born December 31, 1831. His father was a bandmaster and teacher of singing at Kendal. Deceased, who studied under Dr. Camidge and Henry Phillips, was appointed organist of Kendal Parish Church in 1847, when he was only fifteen, and he therefore held the post for fifty years. Mr. Smallwood, who was greatly esteemed, wrote a "Pianoforte Tutor" which has had an immense sale. Among his best known collections are "Flowers of Melody," "Home Treasures," Youthful Pleasures," and "Classics at Home." He also composed numerous anthems, hymns, and songs. The interment took place at Park Side Cemetery, Kendal.

Marie Seebach, the distinguished German tragedian, died, on the 2nd ult., at St. Moritz, Switzerland, whither she had gone in search of health. The deceased lady was born at Riga in 1834, and at the age of fifteen entered the Conservatorium of Cologne with a view to an operatic career. After one or two unsuccessful minor engagements, however, she exchanged the operatic stage for the drama, a sphere in which she speedily gained pre-eminence in Germany, her fame subsequently extending throughout Europe and the United States. She was married to the celebrated Wagnerian tenor, Albert Riemann, from whom, however, she was divorced in 1868.

The death is announced, on the 6th ult., at Brussels, of M. Martin Lazare, a well-known pianist and composer, and one of the most esteemed personalities in the musical world of the Belgian capital. He resided for many years at The Hague, where he was Court pianist to the late King William, but since 1870 had been established at Brussels. His compositions include an opera, "Le Roi de Bohème," brought out at the Royal Opera at The Hague; an operetta entitled "Les Deux Mandarins," produced at Brussels; some chamber music, including a frequently produced pianoforte trio, and numerous pianoforte pieces. M. Lazare, who twice visited London for a lengthy period, was in his seventy-third year.

The Italian composer, Giovanni Battista Meiners, died on the 5th ult., at Cortenova, at the age of seventy-one. Born at Milan in 1826, he was a pupil of the Conservatorio of that town, and afterwards studied under Sechter in Vienna. Senhor Meiners was a teacher at the Guildhall School of Music when that institution was yet in its infancy.

Nicola Bassi, a distinguished violinist and composer, died on the 9th ult. at Cremona. A pupil of Carlo Bignami and Gerolamo Manaro, he had gained considerable reputation as a virtuoso of his instrument when only fifteen years of age, and in 1861 was appointed to a professorship at the Conservatorio of Cremona.

Antonio Melchiori, well-known as a former conductor of the Theatre della Scala, Milan, died on July 24, at the age of sixty-nine. He was an excellent violinist, for which instrument, as well as for the pianoforte, he wrote a number of pieces, and he was, moreover, the composer of a great many ballets brought out at La Scala and other Italian theatres.

The death occurred, on the 3rd ult., at Ostend, of M. Henri Gillet, the gifted solo violoncellist of the Colonne and Lamoureux orchestras in Paris, and latterly also a professor at the Musical Academy at Barcelona. M. Gillet was only twenty-seven years of age.

Madame Marian Williams, at one time a favourite Welsh concert vocalist, died in London on the 2nd ult. The deceased lady, who was a cousin of Mrs. Mary Davies, was gifted with a remarkably fine and clear voice. Some twenty years ago she was a leading soprano in the oratorios performed in connection with the Eisteddfodau. She gained the Westmoreland Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, of which she was an Associate.

Mr. Samuel Harraden, whose death occurred on July 17, at Hampstead, at the age of seventy-six, was a musician of considerable attainments, and in his earlier days an organist of some distinction. He was born in Cambridge and studied under Professor Walmisley, organist of Trinity College, in that alma mater, and at the age of twenty obtained the post of organist at St. Luke's, Cheetham Hill, Manchester. In 1846 he accepted a similar post at the Old Mission Church, Calcutta, in the musical life of which town he at once assumed an important position. He was the founder of the first Glee Club there, entered with enthusiasm into the study of Hindoo music, and was appointed successively Professor at the Hindoo College of Music, at the Martinière, and at the Free School. Having invested his considerable earnings in a musical instrument import business which unfortunately failed, Mr. Harraden resigned his musical appointments, undertook the management of the firm, and, with admirable spirit and resourceful enterprise, was able, after some years of arduous toil, to redeem the credit of the business. On account of his knowledge of Hindoo music the deceased musician received the diploma of Doctor of Music from the Bengal Royal Academy of Music.

Mrs. Roger Ascham, better known by her professional name of Maggie Reece, died recently at Port Elizabeth, in her thirty-seventh year. While yet a student, she occasionally sang before Her Majesty the Queen, and the King and Queen of the Belgians, and her fine contralto voice and excellent artistic qualities were also much appreciated at the Crystal Palace and St. James's Hall concerts.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On July 22, at Coburg, Eduard Eichhorn, one of the two brothers Eichhorn (who, as "youthful prodigies," gave concerts throughout Europe), aged seventy-three.

On July 25, at Vienna, Frau Cecilie Cohn-Hollänger, formerly a well-known pianist.

On July 27, at Stuttgart, Wilhelm Hermann, leading oboe at the Opera and professor of pianoforte at the Conservatorium, aged sixty.

On July 28, at Paris, Georges Bertal, dramatic author and librettist, aged forty.

On July 29, at Weisenfels, L. Bucheister, composer and musical director, aged sixty-seven.

On July 26, in London, Henry Dore Reed, for over twenty years manager and secretary of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's entertainment, aged fifty-six.

On July 31, at Milan, Luigi Galli, organist, aged thirty-two.

On the 2nd ult., at Brunswick, Hermann Schrötter, for twenty years operatic tenor at the Court Theatre, distinguished in Wagnerian parts, aged fifty-four.

On the 2nd ult., at Trier, Bernhard Triebel, composer, conductor at the Stadt-Theater.

On the 3rd ult., at Fulham, London, Henry Smith, principal oboe and cor anglais of the Glasgow Choral Union, formerly of the Royal Italian Opera and Philharmonic concerts, aged forty-one.

On the 3rd ult., at Bologna, Guglielmo Cavazza, trumpet virtuoso, professor at the Liceo Musicale.

On the 8th ult., at Paris, Madame Dietsch, vocalist, widow of M. Dietsch, the composer and former conductor of the Grand Opéra, aged eighty-six.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"HOW TO LISTEN TO MUSIC."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Having read Mr. Krehbiel's book with the above title, reviewed in The Musical Times of last month, I venture to draw your attention to one or two slight technical inaccuracies which seem to have escaped the notice of your reviewer. On page 107, in speaking of the horn, he describes the action of the hand inserted in the bell as raising instead of lowering the open note.

Also on page 121, in speaking of the full score extract at the end of the book, the horns and contra-fagotto should be included with the double bass as sounding an octave lower.

In regard to the question of the cuckoo, Mr. Krehbiel seems to take it for granted that the cuckoo sings always a minor third; the fact, of course, being that the interval varies between a minor third (or less) and a fourth.

Yours faithfully,

Llandudno, August 10, 1897. R. H. Whall.

"THE CAMPBELLS ARE COMING."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Referring to the article "New Lights upon Old Tunes," in your issue for this month, perhaps the following may be of interest to your readers.

In the year 1680, Campbell of Glenorchy—afterwards created Earl of Breadalbane—marched North to Caithness-shire with 1,000 followers to enforce his claim to the earldom of Caithness, which was then vacant, but which was also claimed by Sinclair of Keiss, a descendant of the late Earl. The rival parties met at a place called Altimarlach, about two miles from Wick, and there was a short but fierce and bloody battle in which the Campbells were completely victorious, killing, according to one account, eighty, and, according to another, 200 of their opponents. Now it is said this was the occasion which called forth the air "The Campbells are coming," as also another which is now known as "Lord Breadalbane's March," and that they were both composed—the latter extempore, as a bagpipe voluntary during the heat of battle—by Finlay MacIvor, chief bard and piper to Glenorchy. These statements are given in full detail in a book entitled "Civil and Traditional History of Caithness," and the author also states that a song composed by MacIvor, under peculiar and amusing circumstances in honour of a fellow clansman, was still known in his (the author's) day (1794-1864) in the Highlands of Caithness.

I am, &c.,

Jedburgh, August 7, 1897. Jno. MacIvor.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Reader.—We should advise you to study privately under some good coach who is experienced in preparing candidates for examinations. Past examination papers may generally be obtained from the various examining bodies. We understand that Messrs. Novello will shortly issue a handbook dealing with musical examinations which will contain many specimen examination papers.

H. F. S.—The music of the popular trio "Ye shepherds, tell me" ("The Wreath"), was composed by Joseph Mazzinghi (1765-1844), who was born and lived in London. We regret that at present we cannot trace the authorship of the words of the trio. Perhaps some of our readers can throw the desired light upon the subject.

Musicus.—Rubinstein died at Peterhof, near St. Petersburg, on November 20, 1894. Weber was born, probably on December 18, 1786, at Eutin, Oldenburg, and died at 103 (formerly 79), Great Portland Street, London, during the night of June 4, 1826.

M. D. (Claughton).—We think that you will get all necessary information upon the "Mozart Gesellschaft" by writing to A. Hughes-Hughes, Esq., British Museum, London, W.C.

N. J. M.—The opera-houses in Paris, Berlin, and Dresden are usually open all the year round, except, perhaps, during the months of June, July, August, and September.

T. H.—Have you not made some mistake either in the name of the composer or in the title of the part-song ("Hark! how the songsters of the grove," by Henry Purcell)?

G. T.—Practise the notes on "oo-oh-ah," changing from one to the other on the same note and in the same breath. Sing softly and take long breaths.

A. L. (Hawarden).—Both the score and parts of Schubert's String Trio in B flat are published and may be obtained of Messrs. Novello and Co.

H. P.—Thanks; but we are unable to make use of your acrostic.

An Old Chorister.—F sharp.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Aberayron.—A very successful Eisteddfod was held on the 11th ult. The prize of £30 in the chief choral competition, for which only two choirs entered, was won by the Llanddewi Brefi choir, conducted by Mr. M. T. Glyndwr Richards, the test piece being "Britons, rejoice." In the male-voice competition the test piece was "Llewellyn ein Llyw Olaf," and the prize was £20. Four choirs competed—viz., Llandyssul (conductor, Mr. J. R. Phillips), Drefach (Mr. Dl. Jenkins), Lampeter (Mr. Glynfab Williams), and Mountain Ash (Mr. Glyndwr Richards). The prize was awarded to Mountain Ash.

Cape Town.—The third of the series of chamber music concerts took place in the Good Hope Hall on July 21. The programme included the following concerted pieces: Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat and the slow movement from Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio (Op. 2). Excellent solo performances on the violin and violoncello were given by Mr. Percy Ould and Herr Windisch respectively, and Mrs. Tennyson Cole proved herself to be an acceptable vocalist in her rendering of Goring Thomas's "My heart is weary." The other performers, in addition to those already mentioned, were Mrs. Barrow-Dowling and Mrs. Leader (pianoforte), Miss Neave and Mr. Prati (violins), and Mr. Riegelhuth (viola). Mr. Barrow-Dowling was the accompanist at this enjoyable concert.

Chigwell.—The musical features of the speech day at Chigwell School consisted of an organ recital in the Parish Church and a concert by the pupils. The programme of the latter included a Greek speech from the "Ion" of Euripides, with incidental music composed by Mr. Henry Riding, music-master of the school, who also conducted the concert and gave the organ recital.

Halesworth.—The organist of the Parish Church, Mr. R. Price, gave an organ recital, on the 13th ult., in aid of the organ repairs fund. Smart's Overture in D and Rinck's Flute Concerto were the chief features of the programme, and Master Frederic Pedgrift sang three solos with much acceptance.

Hanley.—Mr. J. A. MacGregor has been presented with a reading lamp and dressing case from the choir and congregation of Trinity Church, on his retirement from that church.

Harrogate.—The programmes of the daily concerts given by the Town Band, under the direction of Mr. J. Sidney Jones, deserve notice because of their originality. The first part of the six performances for the week ending the 21st inst. were arranged for as follows: "Half-hours with" (1) Ed. German, Cowen, and Sidney Jones; (2) Gounod, Strauss, and Weber; (3) Beethoven, Sullivan, and Mendelssohn; (4) Schubert, Grieg, and Wagner; (5) Mozart, Meyerbeer, and Balfe; (6) Verdi, Donizetti, and Offenbach.

Honolulu.—A special Diamond Jubilee Thanksgiving service was held at St. Andrew's Cathedral, on July 23, which was attended by Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, Prince David Kawananakoa, and other eminent personages. A choir of eighty voices, under the able direction of Mr. Wray Taylor, is said to have well rendered "music of a class never before heard in Honolulu." The service included J. M. W. Young's Te Deum in G and a setting of the Jubilate in the same key by Mr. Taylor, who played the National Anthem as a concluding voluntary.

Keighley.—The committee of the Musical Union have decided to perform "The Swan and the Skylark," by Goring Thomas, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" at the first subscription concert of the coming season. A recital of Wallace's opera "Maritana" is to be given in December. Mr. Alfred Benton, of Leeds, is the newly appointed conductor of the society.

Keswick.—An organ recital was given by Mr. R. Meyrick Roberts, organist of St. Andrew's Church, Penrith, at St. John's Church, on August 17. The programme included pieces by Mendelssohn, G. MacMaster, J. S. Bach, Alex. Guilmant, Theo. Dubois, Léfèbure-Wély, and Wagner.

Kingston (Jamaica).—In celebration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee the Kingston Choral Union gave a performance of the late Dr. Bradford's "Song of Jubilee" in the Parish Church, on July 13, under the direction of Mr. T. Ellis Jackson, with marked success. Miss Spence, Mr. Nation, and Mr. Dadd presided at the organ; and other features in the programme were a violin solo by Mr. Ballen and vocal solos by Mr. Jackson and Miss McDermott, the young lady being designated "Jamaica's Patti."

Llandudno.—This popular resort has, with regard to music, been much favoured during the past month. In addition to the fine orchestra at the Pier (comprising some of the best players in England, and led by Mr. A. W. Payne, the chef d'attaque of the London Queen's Hall orchestra), conducted by Mr. A. E. Bartle, who also frequently officiates as solo pianist, another band, not quite so numerous, but equally efficient—since it includes many of the chief members of the Queen's Hall orchestra—commenced operations on July 31, under the conductorship of Mr. John Saunders, at Riviere's Concert Hall. Both orchestras perform music of a much higher class than one is accustomed to associate with seaside recreations, and the fact deserves warm acknowledgment. Among the vocalists who have appeared at these concerts during the past month may be named Mesdames Belle Cole, Alice Gomez, Clara Butt, and C. Williams; Messrs. C. Santley, Ben Davies, D. Bispham, W. Paull, and the Meister Glee Singers. It should be mentioned that between them these orchestras are responsible for three concerts each day, besides extra concerts on Sundays and Wednesdays, the programmes of which are more "classical" than those given at other times, and are even occasionally devoted exclusively to chamber music of the highest class. On the evening of the 11th ult. the first part of the Pier Pavilion concert consisted entirely of compositions by Mr. Edward German, and was conducted by the composer in person in presence of an audience of over 3,000 persons, who were most enthusiastic.

Maidstone.—The annual students' concert of the Maidstone School of Music, followed by the prize-giving, took place on July 26. The various performances on the pianoforte and violin reached a high level of excellence. Dr. G. F. Huntly, in presenting the certificates gained at the Associated Board Examination, made some excellent remarks full of encouragement to those who were earnestly studying the art at the Maidstone School of Music.

North Berwick, N.B.—Mr. Charles H. Nutton, the newly appointed organist of St. Baldred's Church, gave his first organ recital on the 11th ult. Selections were given from Haydn, Saint-Saëns, Wély, Tartini, Schubert, and Handel. Mr. Nutton contributed two violin solos, the Rev. I. Dyer presiding at the organ, and Herr Hochstein gave two violoncello solos. There was a large audience of residents and visitors.

Oxford.—An organ recital was given in the Town Hall, on July 24, in aid of the Linton Memorial Schools, by Mr. W. L. Biggs, organist of St. Peter-le-Bailey Church, when the programme included pieces by Theo. Stern, Batiste, Guilmant, Wagner, Bach, Schumann, and Beethoven. The vocalists were Miss Gwendolen Hayes and Mr. John Lomas.

Radstock.—The members of the Radstock Choral Society, assisted by the Bath Orpheus Glee Society, gave their third concert of the season on July 22, in the grounds at South Hill, by kind permission of Mr. McMurtrie. The programme consisted of several popular part-songs (including some composed by Mendelssohn for singing in the open air), all of which were admirably rendered by the two choirs. Mr. H. T. Sims, who directs both societies, was an efficient and painstaking conductor.

Reading.—Mr. C. G. Thomas has recently been the recipient of an illuminated address, books, inkstand, photographic album, cheque, purse of gold, and other tokens of regard from the various circles of his friends and pupils in and near Reading.

Sculcoates.—Dr. G. H. Smith gave an organ recital at the Parish Church on July 26, when his programme included Mendelssohn's Sonata in B flat (No. 4), Guilmant's Prayer and Cradle Song, Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor (by request), and Lemmens's Fanfare and Final. Mr. Ratcliffe contributed two vocal solos with much acceptance.

Slaithwaite.—The fifteenth "annual sing" in aid of the Huddersfield Infirmary and Manchester Royal Eye Institution took place on the 8th ult., when about 200 singers and players braved the inclement weather. The programme consisted of choruses from "The Messiah" and the "Creation," in addition to several hymn tunes, rendered with all the heartiness and freedom which characterise Yorkshire choirs. Mr. A. Burnley conducted.

Swansea.—The annual festival in connection with the Church Choral Union of the Archdeaconry of Carmarthen was recently held at St. John's Church, Hafod, and proved to be an unqualified success. Upwards of 700 voices took part in the service, and these represented the following choirs:—Bettws, Clydach, Cwmaman, Gorslas, Hafod, Hendy, Kidwelly, Llandebie, Llanfair-ar-y-bryn, Llanon, Pembrey, Pont Yates, Pontyberem, Waunarlwydd, and Ystradgynlais. Under the direction of Mr. H. Radcliffe, the choirmaster to the Union, the united choirs sang with much precision and pleasing effect the various psalms, canticles, anthems, and hymns arranged for the occasion. Mr. J. Cooke (Christ Church, Carmarthen) presided at the organ.

Sydney, N.S.W.—A Jubilee concert was given on July 6, at the York Street Centenary Hall, under the direction of Mr. W. L. B. Mote. The conductor had composed for the occasion a dignified Jubilee hymn, "Sixty years of service splendid," which was well received, and Master Arnold Mote's organ solo, an original "Queen's Commemoration March," also won acceptance. The orchestra played with spirit J. E. West's march "Victoria—our Queen." "The Queen's Song," by Eaton Faning, proved one of the best numbers on the programme, and was effectively rendered by the choir and orchestra. Solos were contributed by Miss Millie Wynn and Mr. H. T. Gordon.

Windermere.—Mr. Arthur Naylor gave an organ recital at St. John's Church, on the 19th ult., the programme of which included Mendelssohn's fifth Organ Sonata, Mackenzie's "Benedictus," Handel's "Occasional" Overture, Guilmant's Allegro moderato (upon a theme by Handel), and other attractive pieces. The Rev. Cyril A. W. Robins, Precentor of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, contributed some acceptable vocal solos.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. W. Humphreys, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Nicholas Church, Child Okeford.—Mr. Andrew MacCunn, Organist and Choirmaster to the Free Mid Church, Greenock, N.B.

RUTH

A HARVEST PASTORAL

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

WORDS BY

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

FOURTH AND FIFTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Ninth and Tenth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twentieth to Twenty-fifth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

†ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

ENGLISH FANTASIA

"IN COMMEMORATION"

FOR FULL ORCHESTRA

COMPOSED BY

EDWARD GERMAN.

String Parts, Five Shillings and Sixpence.
Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

Beyond the essentially English style of his "English Fantasia," as it is also called, Mr. Edward German has introduced nothing that is not original, so that there is no reason why the charming work should not be heard frequently after this year's festival is over. It well deserves a place in the regular repertory of English compositions, for it is most vigorous and spontaneous. The workmanship of all three movements is admirable, and the thematic material happily invented. The composer, who conducted, was recalled twice at the close.

STANDARD.

There is considerable Wagnerian feeling in this rather rhapsodical work, which is alternately warlike and peaceful in manner. The Fantasia, which is, unquestionably, very clever, was warmly received.

MORNING POST.

In writing his Fantasia Mr. German has evidently had Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" in his mind, and has striven to produce a sort of British equivalent to that gorgeous musical glorification of the German Empire. He has not made use of any national melodies, but has preferred to rely upon his own inspiration. The scoring is extremely clever, although the percussion instruments are somewhat unduly prominent. Very quaint is the second section, with its solo for the cor anglais.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The "English Fantasia" is bright and spirited, thoroughly national in character, and very effectively scored. The audience were so pleased with it that they twice recalled the composer.

SIX ACTION SONGS

WORDS BY

MARY HUTCHINSON

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Space prevents us from noticing in detail this interesting work. The music, in which Scandinavian influence is perceptible, is fresh and imaginative. There is a great variety of rhythm; and the epithet 'dramatic' in the title is quite appropriate."—The Musical Times.

"A new work of real power and grit is John More Smieton's Cantata 'Connla.' . . . The music flows natural and transparent, as do the words; and, taken altogether, the work is admirable in the arrangement of its matter and the clearness of its treatment. Conductors and choirmasters should not fail to procure copies of this new and distinctly notable production."—Musical Opinion.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With this object in view a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption or rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The solo was very finely sung by Mr. Francis Harford, who gave it with all the requisite contrast of expression, and whose beautiful voice and skilful vocalisation found a congenial opportunity in the florid passages of the middle section."—The Times.
"The vocalist was Mr. Francis Harford, whose voice has lately increased very remarkably in volume and beauty of timbre. He gave a thoughtful and artistic rendering of two unfamiliar songs by Schubert, the poetical 'Greisengesang' and 'Kreuzzug,' besides bringing forward a delightful arrangement by Mr. Coleridge Taylor of the old ballad 'The Three Ravens.'"—The Times.
"'The Forsaken Merman,' by Mr. Arthur Somervell, was given under its composer's direction, the solo part being sung in admirable style and with much artistic intelligence by Mr. Francis Harford."—The Times.
"This work is especially noteworthy for the splendid picturesqueness of the bass recitatives, which were sung with power and excellent expression by Mr. Francis Harford."—Daily Graphic.
"The solo in Mr. Somervell's picturesque work was taken by Mr. Francis Harford, a young singer whose remarkably fine voice and intelligent singing should cause his future career to be watched with interest."—Globe.
"The frantic agony of Hercules' death song, interpreted by Mr. F. Harford with genuine force and sincerity, held the mighty audience spellbound, and was greeted with a burst of enthusiasm."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"This work contains a very fine bass air, which was effectively sung by Mr. Francis Harford."—The Musical Times.
"Mr. Francis Harford gave a really fine rendering of the great bass recitative and air in 'Wachet, betet,' with just the right amount of dramatic expression."—Musical News.
"Vocal relief was afforded by Mr. Francis Harford, who is the possessor of a fine bass voice of a most pleasing quality and good range. He demonstrated in 'Lascia Amor,' from the opera 'Orlando,' his mastery of the requirements of Handelian vocal music."—Liverpool Courier.
"Mr. Francis Harford, whose voice and style recall those of Mr. Plunket Greene, gave a well considered interpretation of the baritone solos."—Leeds Mercury.
"Probably Mr. Francis Harford more nearly approached the ideal Handelian singer. No fault could be found with his technique, and his voice was of sufficient range and power, but beyond this he possesses the gift of singing with distinction. Every one of his solos was most expressively interpreted."—Yorkshire Herald.
"Mr. Somervell's Leeds cantata was perhaps the feature of the festival. The rendering was marked by a finish exceeding anything that had gone before, and Mr. Harford sang the solo part with fine voice and expressive emphasis."—Bradford Observer.
"The splendid bass voice and earnest method of Mr. Francis Harford presages a great future."—Western Mail.

Berlin:

"Mr. Francis Harford, as King Eberhard von Franken, surprised us with his splendid bass voice and distinction of style."—Börsen Courier.
"Mr. Francis Harford had only to declaim the death and agony of King Conrad. This he did in an extraordinarily characteristic manner."—Lokal Anzeiger, January 22, 1897.

Dr. C. H. H. PARRY (Chester Festival, Nov., 1894).—"Bennett sang most admirably; the part has never been better done. . . . I am indebted to you for giving him such an excellent idea of it."

Extracts from Recent Testimonials:—

J. MUNRO COWARD, Esq. (Jan. 20, 1897).—"I am delighted with the voice and method of Master E. Favell, and believe he will take a position as a famous chorister." Rev. W. H. WEEKES (March, 1897).—"Favell does you immense credit; he sings, unlike most other boys I have heard, with such expression and taste. . . . a pleasure to think boys can be taught to sing in a perfectly musicianly way and in a cultivated and refined manner. His voice is very rich and powerful." Richmond Times (April, 1897).—"Master Child exhibited wonderful control over his well-trained voice. . . . was beautifully interpreted"; and (April, 1897), "Child won great enthusiasm for his pure and cultured singing." Dr. A. MADELEY RICHARDSON (April, 1897).—"We are very pleased with La Touche; he has sung our principal solos (St. Saviour's, Southwark) and given every satisfaction." E. H. THORNE, Esq.—"Touche in his singing (St. Anne's, Soho) gave us all great satisfaction. He has a fine voice and sings with good taste and feeling." The Times (March, 1897).—"Exquisitely sung" (La Touche). Morning Post (March, 1897).—"Beautifully sung" (La Touche).

"Master Favell, who has succeeded Master Bennett as Soprano Soloist at St. Alban's, Teddington, is proving himself a most worthy successor to that able vocalist. Last Sunday evening, in the anthem 'Be not afraid,' he gave a splendid interpretation of the solo. He is a highly gifted and accomplished young vocalist."—Surrey Comet, March 29, 1897.

Wolverton.—"Favell delighted us with his expressive and artistic rendering of the solos in Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm. He gave great satisfaction." — (Signed) H. J. Hippsley, Org. and Choirmaster, May, 1897.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

OCTOBER 1, 1897.

SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

"The truest friend to music and musicians," as Sir George Grove has been felicitously designated, lives in an old wooden house not very far from the great glass palace with which his name was so long and so eminently associated. It was once the habitation of Charles James Fox, the politician, who is said to have indicated its whereabouts to a friend by saying "Drive to Dulwich and ask for the prettiest cottage in Kent." Indeed, Sydenham is redolent of associations of that date; for a quarter of a mile up the road stands the old residence of the Adams family, one of whom was private secretary to Mr. Pitt; and on Peak Hill, beyond the station, lived Campbell, the poet, who used to be visited by Byron, and also by Scott, who, with Ticknor, the American, slept one night at the "Greyhound," and has recorded that the beefsteaks he had for supper and breakfast were the best he ever ate. This quaint habitation has been the home of "G." for thirty-six years. His "den," as he is pleased to call his study, looks out upon a shady lawn in a pleasant garden, whose tall elms and gay flowers seem especially bright on this cloudy autumn morning. The books, crowding the dwarf bookcases, form some index to the encyclopædic mind of their genial owner, and did, perhaps, more so before his Biblical library was sold off a few months since. A row of no less than seventy bound volumes of pamphlets on musical subjects, all carefully indexed, are quite unique in a private library; and, speaking from an editorial point of view, would prove a veritable Klondyke for "copy." Amongst other treasures is the autograph MS. of Schubert's Symphony in E, which was given by the composer's brother, Ferdinand Schubert, to Mendelssohn, at whose death it passed to his brother, who gave it to Sir George. But the books within these timbered walls stretch out in all directions—you find them on staircases, in curious passages, and even in the bedrooms—those books which have helped to satisfy their owner's life-long voracity for reading upon innumerable subjects.

Would that we could even attempt to adequately portray the striking and magnetic personality of Sir George Grove. As he relates one incident after another of his long, useful, and busy life, the sympathetic listener is spell-bound with admiration of the enthusiasm, the indomitable perseverance, and the noble aspirations which have ever animated the life-work of our revered and venerable friend.

George Grove was born August 13, 1820, at Clapham, Surrey, so the dictionaries say; but we are able to give more precise information in regard to his birthplace. "Ah! I wish," says Sir George, "you could still see it. The Wandsworth Road Station of the Chatham and Dover line now stands on (or covers) the very foundations of the house. The property was about 6 acres; a large garden of 1¼ acres, with big trees, thorns, curious crab-trees, &c., running down to the Wandsworth Road; a kitchen garden of half-an-acre behind, and beyond that a paddock running up to Larkhall Lane. There was then only one house on Battersea fields, which were tenanted not by bricks and mortar as now, but by wheatfields and immense herds of milch cows. We could see, from our upper windows, the roof of the 'Red House,' on the Thames, opposite Chelsea, and could hear the drums and fifes of the lads going to bed in Chelsea Hospital." George Grove was sent as a weekly boarder to a school on Clapham Common, kept first by a Mr. Greaves, who has been immortalised by Macaulay, another of his pupils, and then by a Mr. Elwell. One of Sir George's schoolfellows, and his earliest friend, was Granville Bradley, now Dean of Westminster, whose sister he afterwards married. Grove and Bradley—two little mites of eight—were both in trouble. The former had lost his mother and the latter had never been away from home before. The two sorrowful schoolfellows walked hand in hand through the groves and gorse-wildernesses which seventy years ago made up Clapham Common.

Master George began music by hearing his mother play from "The Messiah" to her children—of whom there were ten—out of an old vocal score, having "voices and figured bass only." Then came Bach's "Forty-eight." In this connection we are told that the then organist of Clapham Parish Church, one John Blackbourn, always pronounced Bach's name "Bawk." One day Mr. Blackbourn played "Achieved is the glorious work," when young Grove went up to the organ-loft and asked if that was by "Bawk." Receiving a negative reply, he asked if a "Bawk" fugue could be played "next Sunday," a request which was granted, when Blackbourn gave the Fugue in E in the second book. This so enraptured the young listener that he and his brother used to play this gem of a fugue, as a pianoforte duet, every morning after breakfast before starting for their three-mile walk to town. Other musickings in the Grove family were the Sacred Harmonic Concerts, to which brothers and sisters used to walk from home to Exeter Hall, "returning on their feet." Then everything turned to music; "but," says our friend, "neither I nor my brother could ever play more than a 'Psalm-tune quick,' like Punch's organ-man." He well remembers a visit to the old Surrey Chapel—now, alas! turned to different uses—which was noted for its music; and he was much amused to see the Reader, after he had read the prayers, divest himself of his surplice and hang it over the door of the reading-desk, thereby treating it as a surplus garment. Contrasting the great facilities which students now have of buying cheap music with that of his early days, Sir George recalls the fact that, in 1837, with one of the first guineas ever given to him, he bought a copy of Clarke-Whitfeld's edition of "The Messiah"—"and here it is," he says, as he shows us the well-worn folio. Music, however, was not to be Grove's lifework.

From Elwell's school Grove went to the Stockwell Grammar School (afterwards transferred to Clapham), where for a couple of years he was under the care of the Rev. Charles Pritchard, who may claim to have done for middle-class education what Arnold did for public schools, and who left his impress on the character of the subject of this sketch.

After finally leaving school he was articled for three years to a Mr. Alexander Gordon to learn the profession of a Civil Engineer. Gordon, though not in large practice, was eminent as an advocate for steam carriages on common roads—"motors," in fact—and was at the head of the movement in those early days. His office was in Fludyer Street, Westminster, long since obliterated by the India Office. The characteristic "hobby" feature which has dominated Sir George's life began to manifest itself during his spare hours in London. He was mad in the pursuit of engravings and painters' etchings. Then he used to haunt every place where he could hear or look at music. One such was Novello's music-shop, then in Dean Street, Soho, where, in a back room, there was a fine large case full of scores. He well remembers the first time he saw the late Mr. Henry Littleton, and recalls the agile way in which he jumped over the counter to find a score of the "Creation" for him. The British Museum reading-room numbered him amongst its readers—or, to be more accurate, he went there to copy music. He was familiar both with the "Museum headache" and the "Museum flea"! Here he copied an Allelujah Chorus of Handel's which he thinks has never been printed. Westminster Abbey—and no wonder—was a special source of attraction to this impressionable young man. He says: "Many an entrancing hour did I spend there in the winter months at the afternoon service, with the dim candles below and the impenetrable gloom above, when I thought my heart must have come out of me with emotion and longing." On one of these afternoons he heard Richard Clark—then the chief bass of the choir and noted for being able to take the double D—attempt and not quite succeed in going down to the low D in Purcell's "They that go down to the sea in ships."

After spending three years as a student of engineering in London, Sir George went to Glasgow for two years to gain practical experience in the factory of Robert Napier, on the Broomielaw. Here he served both in the pattern and fitting shops. He had an old square pianoforte in his lonely Glasgow lodgings, a luxury which his father thought to be at least questionable. He did a great deal of reading—Hallam's "History of the Middle Ages" and Robertson's "Charles V." being two works he digested and compared. On February 26, 1839, the minutes of the Institution of Civil Engineers record that "George Grove (of Thurlowe Terrace, Wandsworth Road) was admitted a Graduate." Meantime he was not forgotten by his old friends in Fludyer Street, and Mr. Gordon, having received an order to erect an iron lighthouse at Morant Point, on the Eastern extremity of the island of Jamaica—the first ever put up—sent his old pupil, Grove, to superintend its erection. The secretary to the Jamaica Lighthouse Commissioners met him off Port Royal, in the ship, and was much astonished and somewhat dismayed to find that the engineer had as yet "no sign of whiskers"; however, he was before long relieved from his anxiety. An iron plate at the foot of the lighthouse, which was first permanently lighted November 1, 1842, records his name as the engineer thereof. Scarcely had he returned from Jamaica before he was again despatched by Mr. Gordon on a second similar expedition. This time it was to Bermuda, where the Government were about to build a lighthouse on Gibbs' Hill. Those sufficiently interested in the matter will find a drawing of it in the Illustrated London News of April 20, 1844. It was first lighted on May 1, 1846; and a Parliamentary Blue-book of the time records that the English Treasury paid "George Grove, Engineer, £315 4s. 4d."

Upon his return from Bermuda, where his health had run down, Sir George visited his brother, Mr. Edmund Grove (now of Preston, Brighton), at Lincoln, where he was superintending the erection of a gas-works. "Lincoln," remarks Sir George, "was a splendid place for churches. It contains some of the finest in the country, and there had, as yet, been no restorations!" After a short Lincolnshire holiday he entered the office of Mr. C. H. Wild, one of Mr. Robert Stephenson's chief assistants, who at once sent him off to Chester to look after the erection of the "General Station" there. Here he made the acquaintance of the late Mr. Gunton, organist of the Cathedral, who had a flourishing little singing society of his own, which he soon made acquainted with old and new music, in the shape of Palestrina and of Mendelssohn's part-songs in the "Orpheus." From Chester he was transferred to Bangor, where he served under Edwin Clark, Mr. Stephenson's resident at the Britannia Bridge, with whom he made a close friendship, and took part for eighteen months in the "floating" and other operations of the "tubes." An account of the first floating is recorded in the Spectator of June 23, 1849, which, apart from its interest as Sir George's first appearance in print, we quote for its subject matter:

> The operation of floating the first tube of the Britannia Bridge [over the Menai Straits] from the place in which it was constructed to the foot of the towers by which it is at last to be supported, came off on the evening of Wednesday [i.e., June 20, 1849]. The preceding evening was the one originally fixed on; but, a capstan breaking after hauling out a few feet, it was necessary to put off doing more till the following day. The tube was built at a distance from the bridge of about 2,000 feet, and in a position along the shore, at right angles to the line of railway. It had, therefore, after being borne down by the tide to very near the towers, to be slewed round across the stream, and finally adjusted into its place on the projecting shelf of stone at the foot of the piers. These evolutions were accomplished by ropes from capstans and crabs on the two shores and on the Britannia Rock; the men in charge of which were signalled to from the top of the tube. The final adjustment was a very delicate piece of work, as the width of the recess into which the end of the huge mass had to be inserted is only an inch greater than that of the tube itself: however, it was managed with complete success.
> The whole operation occupied exactly one hour and three-quarters, the order to haul out being given at 7.36 and the Anglesey end entering its recess at 9.22.
> On the tube with Mr. Stephenson were his two assistants, and Messrs. Brunel and Locke, who acted as his honorary assistants, Captain Claxton, and Sir Francis Head. There was a general gathering of engineers and a vast concourse of spectators, who lined the shores and platform on both sides of the Straits.
> The raising of the tube through the 100 feet between its present and its ultimate position will probably take place in the course of a few days. Its length is 472 feet, height at the centre tower 30, and its weight between 1,700 and 1,800 tons.

At the Bridge he came into contact with Robert Stephenson, the great "chief" himself, and with Brunel and Sir Charles Barry, and other eminent visitors to the works. "These distinguished men," says Sir George, "noticed me and were as good as gold to me. They counselled me to go to London and forced me into the secretaryship of the Society of Arts, then vacant by the retirement of Mr. Scott Russell." This was in 1849, when the great Exhibition of 1851 was in active preparation. Season tickets for the Exhibition were sold at the office of the Society of Arts, under the superintendence of the secretary, Mr. Grove, and this brought him into contact with many eminent people, who took to him and rendered him useful service as opportunity offered. Amongst other relics of the time is a letter from the Duke of Wellington himself, ordering two season tickets, beginning with "London, April 15, 1851, at night," and containing a bouncing fault in grammar!

We now come to a great event in the life of our hero—he will allow us to use the word—viz., his connection with the Crystal Palace. As everyone knows, it is virtually the same building as that which stood in Hyde Park as the Great Exhibition of 1851. A company was formed for re-erecting the huge glass palace at Sydenham. One of its chief promoters, Mr. Francis Fuller, who had been one of the leading men in Hyde Park, said one day to Mr. Grove: "You see that we have formed this company, but as yet we have no secretary." "Whom are you going to have?" enquired Mr. Grove, "you'll want a good man for it." Mr. Fuller replied to the effect that the man he wanted stood before him. In this way Sir George became the first secretary of the Crystal Palace. In order to give éclat to the opening ceremony it was thought that an Ode should be specially written, composed, and performed—the words of the Ode to be by Tennyson, and the music by Berlioz! He therefore went down to the Isle of Wight to see the great poet. "Tennyson was very kind and good to me," says Sir George. "He received me with the greatest cordiality, but he could not see his way to writing the poem; and the net result of my visit was the beginning of a truly delightful and valuable friendship, and his explanation of the difference between a 'cowslip' and an 'oxlip,' which I asked him àpropos to his line—

> As cowslip unto oxlip is,
> So seems she to the boy.*

* "The Talking Oak." Line 107.

This he answered by picking one of each in the copse behind the house, and showing me how that one stood erect and the other drooped its head." At the opening of the Crystal Palace by the Queen, June 10, 1854, Miss Clara Novello made a great sensation by singing a high B flat in "God save the Queen," "which was heard right at the other end of the building."

Soon after the Palace was inaugurated Mr. Manns began those daily and weekly orchestral performances which have justly made his name so eminent. The old yearnings for music welled up in the breast of the good secretary. Symphonic music was a new and undiscovered world to him. He had heard of "subjects" and so forth, but understood them not in their modern use. He had listened to the Ninth Symphony at a "New Philharmonic" concert, under Berlioz, in 1852, but "could make very little of it"; and his absence from London had prevented his making acquaintance with Mendelssohn during his visits to England. It was this characteristic thirst for information which started our genial friend on the preparation of those analytical programmes with which his name has been so long, so worthily, and so pleasantly associated. "I wish it to be distinctly understood," he says, "that I have always been an amateur in music. I wrote about the symphonies and concertos because I wished to try to make them clear to myself and to discover the secret of the things that charmed me so; and from that sprang a wish to make other amateurs see it in the same way. The programmes originated thus: We were going to celebrate the birthday of Mozart in 1856, when the Crystal Palace music was just beginning to struggle into existence, and Mr. Manns said to me how much he wished that I would write a few words about Mozart himself and about the works to be performed. I remember writing that initial programme in my dressing-room in my first house at Sydenham, near the church." The concert took place —"in the music room, by the Queen's apartments; North wing"—on Saturday, January 26, 1856, one day before the exact centenary of Mozart's death. The selection included the overture to "Idomeneo"; a Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violin—the latter played by Mr. Manns; the Allegro from the D minor Pianoforte Concerto, performed by "Master John Francis Barnett"; a pianoforte sonata; five vocal pieces; and, at the end, the Andante and Finale from the Symphony in E flat—ten representative numbers in all, the concert being under the conductorship of "August Manns, Music Director." We must be content with two extracts from this eight-page programme. The first is from a notice of the air "Non temer amato bene"—a great favourite of Sir George's, which he immediately starts off humming—sung by Miss Grace Alleyne, with the violin obbligato played by Mr. Manns, about which our annotator says:

> The melody of the Aria is one of those witching tunes which can't be got out of the head.

The next extract is from the notice of the Symphony in E flat, which concluded the concert. After referring to Mozart's extraordinary productivity in the year 1788, we read:

> The circumstances which necessitated such fearful exertion on this and many other occasions in Mozart's life we have no means of ascertaining. [This was before the days of Jahn's "Mozart."] Whatever they were, they were in accordance with a common custom of Nature. She seems to delight in condemning her most gifted sons to an ordeal the very reverse of that which we should anticipate. It seems equally true in Art and in Morals, that it is not by indulgence and favour, but by difficulty and trouble, that the spirit is formed; and in all ages of the world our Davids, Shakspeares, Dantes, Mozarts, and Beethovens must submit to processes which none but their great spirits could survive—to a fiery trial of poverty, ill health, neglect, and misunderstanding—and be "tried as silver is tried," that they may become the teachers of their fellow-men to all time, and shine, like stars in the firmament, for ever and ever.

This last sentence, which is so eminently characteristic of its gifted writer, should be carefully read and pondered.

Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Schubert became very dear to Sir George in his daily intercourse with them through their works. The great personality of Beethoven naturally had a very strong fascination for him. Every scrap of information about the Bonn master was eagerly acquired. The human side of that mighty genius—Beethoven, The Man, as old Sam Wesley called J. S. Bach, his idol—was finely brought out by his most devoted disciple in England. Mendelssohn was another favourite. His "Reformation" Symphony was played for the second time anywhere at the Crystal Palace (November 30, 1867), having been laid on the shelf for thirty-five years. The early symphonies of his childhood were also played from manuscript copies; and on one occasion—November 4, 1871, the anniversary of the composer's death—the two versions of the "Hebrides" Overture were played consecutively.

Schubert, as is well known, has had no sturdier champion in this country than Sir George Grove. The first performance in England of the great C major Symphony took place at the Crystal Palace in 1856. His instrumental works were then practically unknown. In 1865 Dr. Kreissle von Hellborn issued his "Life of Schubert," at the end of which was an incomplete catalogue of the composer's works. Sir George quickly perceived the importance of gaining every possible information about these compositions, many of which were in manuscript and quite unknown. He at once opened up a correspondence with Mr. Spina, the music publisher in Vienna, with the result that the delightful "Rosamunde" music, the B minor (Unfinished) Symphony, &c., were first performed, some from MS. parts, for the first time in England at the Crystal Palace. The unalloyed beauty of the B minor Symphony more than ever intensified the longing to hear other symphonies by the same composer; moreover, the "Rosamunde" music was not complete. Nothing can abate Sir George's breezy enthusiasm when once he is fired. Accordingly he, in company with his young friend, Arthur Sullivan, started off to Vienna, in the autumn of 1867, hotly in pursuit of the missing treasures from Schubert's prolific brain. Great success attended their efforts. Symphonies, overtures, &c., were discovered, carefully examined, and then copied. The whole account of this most interesting visit of these two Englishmen is found in the Appendix (by Sir George Grove) to the English translation of Kreissle's "Life of Schubert," a book which is out of print. We therefore give, as a specimen, a striking extract, written in Sir George's most graphic style:

So far, success—brilliant success. But I had failed in one chief object of my journey. The "Rosamunde" music was almost dearer to me than the symphonies. Besides the entr'actes in B minor and B flat, the "Ballo, No. 2," and the "Ballet Air, No. 9," which we had already acquired in 1866, we had found at Mr. Spina's an entr'acte after the second act, and a "Hirten-Melodie" for clarinets, bassoons, and horns; but we still required the accompaniments to the Romance and the two choruses, as well as the total number of pieces and their sequence in the drama. To quit Vienna without these would have been too cruel, and yet neither from Dr. Schneider, nor Mr. Spina, nor in the library of the Musik-Verein—where the admirable librarian, Mr. C. F. Pohl, was entirely at our service—had we succeeded in finding a trace of them.

It was Thursday afternoon, and we proposed to leave on Saturday for Prague. We made a final call on Dr. Schneider, to take leave and repeat our thanks, and also, as I now firmly believe, guided by a special instinct. The doctor was civility itself; he again had recourse to the cupboard, and showed us some treasures which had escaped us before. I again turned the conversation to the "Rosamunde" music; he believed that he had at one time possessed a copy or sketch of it all. Might I go into the cupboard and look for myself? Certainly, if I had no objection to being smothered with dust. In I went; and after some search, during which my companion kept the doctor engaged in conversation, I found, at the bottom of the cupboard, and in its farthest corner, a bundle of music-books two feet high, carefully tied round, and black with the undisturbed dust of nearly half-a-century. It was like the famous scene at the monastery of Souriani on the Natron lakes, so well described by Mr. Curzon: "Here is a box!" exclaimed the two monks, who were nearly choked with the dust; "we have found a box, and a heavy one too." "A box!" shouted the blind abbot, who was standing in the outer darkness of the oil-cellar—"a box! where is it?" "Bring it out! bring out the box! Heaven be praised! We have found a treasure! Lift up the box! Pull out the box!" shouted the monks in various tones of voice. We were hardly less vociferous than the monks, when we had dragged out the bundle into the light, and found that it was actually neither more nor less than what we were in search of. Not Dr. Cureton, when he made his truly romantic discovery of the missing leaves of the Syriac Eusebius, could have been more glad or more grateful than I was at this moment. For these were the part-books of the whole of the music in "Rosamunde," tied up after the second performance in December, 1823, and probably never disturbed since. Dr. Schneider must have been amused at our excitement; but let us hope that he recollected his own days of rapture; at any rate, he kindly overlooked it, and gave us permission to take away with us and copy what we wanted, and I now felt that my mission to Vienna had not been fruitless.

The sequel is hardly less amusing. Having invoked the aid of Mr. C. F. Pohl, author of the "Life of Haydn," "Haydn and Mozart in London," and of many most valuable articles in the "Dictionary of Music," the three enthusiasts—Grove, Sullivan, and Pohl—divided their work and, writing their very hardest, contrived before two in the morning to get all the missing accompaniments copied. Much to the astonishment of Pohl, the two Englishmen finished up with a delicious game of leap-frog round the room in the early twilight. Sir George Grove and Sir Arthur Sullivan playing leap-frog! No wonder that they left Vienna in the best of spirits, delighted at the success of their missionary enterprise.

Year by year the analytical programmes grew in extent and importance. In fact, they became an indispensable companion to the enjoyment and proper understanding of the music. Many a listener—like the present writer—while not then knowing him, adored "G.," and is to-day deeply grateful to him for having been his "guide, philosopher, and friend" in the delightful regions of orchestral music, and for leading him so pleasantly in the paths of appreciation of the creations of those mighty masters of music. It seems a great pity that all the important analyses are not permanently preserved. But we must be very thankful that the studies of the Beethoven symphonies are thus accessible, having formed the basis of that fascinating work by Sir George, "Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies," which Messrs. Novello and Co. issued in one volume last year. No more appropriate book could be selected for a musical present.

It would be a great injustice to the subject of our sketch did we neglect to mention an important phase of his career, which has been eclipsed by his more recent prominence in musical life. We refer to his remarkable Biblical studies. He had been brought up to know the Bible well, and knew a great deal of it by heart, but the critical study of it was distasteful to him. One day James Fergusson, author of "The Handbook of Architecture," who had novel theories of his own in regard to old sites in the East, remarked to Sir George that there was no full Concordance of the proper names in the Bible. Having heard of Cruden, Sir George doubted such a statement, which, however, he found to be quite true. Well, he set to work at once and, with the help of his wife, made a complete index of every occurrence of every proper name in the Old Testament, New Testament, and Apocrypha, with their equivalents in Hebrew, LXX., Greek, and Vulgate Latin. (This was in 1853 or 1854.) It is very interesting to look at the folio volumes containing this labour of love as Sir George takes them down from his shelves. The next step (in 1854) was a great event in his life. He saw Arthur Stanley, Dean of Westminster (whose name and works were already familiar to him) for the first time. Stanley was then Canon of Canterbury, and was finishing his "Sinai and Palestine" at his Canterbury residence. Sir George vividly recalls how Stanley, hurrying down his narrow study, came forward to him, with hands extended, as if he were welcoming an old friend. He then showed his visitor the work he was engaged upon—the Appendix to "Sinai and Palestine," the first step in the topography of the Bible. "He explained," says Sir George, "that in Hebrew there were distinct words for all the different kinds of natural objects—for mountains and hills, and rocks and plains, and rivers and torrents—and that while in Hebrew these words were never interchanged, in the English Bible they were used indiscriminately, and that a great deal of light might be thrown on the narratives if these were set right in our Bibles, and other things of the same sort rectified. He set me alight in a moment and I fairly blazed up! I rubbed up my Hebrew, of which I had learnt the alphabet at Elwell's school, I got up enough German to plough through Ewald and Ritter, and plunged with delight into a sea of Biblical research." This fascinating work engendered the strong desire to visit the Holy Land, to see the places themselves and gain information on the spot. Sir George is nothing if he is not thorough, and he paid two visits to Palestine—in 1859 and 1861. The outcome of these journeys was the foundation of the Palestine Exploration Fund (in 1865), which was due to the inception of our friend. At the annual meeting of that Society, held May 16, 1870, the chairman, the Archbishop of York, said: "In calling upon Mr. Grove [to second a resolution] I must venture to say, in the presence of my brother officials of this Society, that he is virtually the founder and institutor of the Society, and has done wonders for it throughout."

Then came Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible" (Vol. I., March 15, 1860). "Dr. Smith," says Sir George, "had proposed the Dictionary and was looking for help. Stanley told him of me, and of my list of proper names, and there we were!" Sir George did a good deal of the editorial work. He thinks he wrote 1,100 pages of the book. He even re-wrote some of the articles, but retained the initials of their original writers! In this way he was brought into contact with scholars like Lightfoot, Layard, the Pooles, W. Aldis Wright, Canon Cook, and "half-a-hundred more good men and true." Other of Sir George's painstaking Biblical geographical work will be found in his Index to Clark's "Bible Atlas" (published by the S.P.C.K., 1868), in which the places are recorded first in English, then in Hebrew, followed by the texts in which the names of the places occur. We quote from the preface:

> The index, compiled by Mr. Grove, is intended to contain an exhaustive statement of the occurrences of every geographical name in the English version of the Old and New Testament and the Apocrypha, with its origin in Hebrew or Greek, and the modern name of its site, whether known or only conjectured. In all cases, what may be regarded as certain is distinguished from what is uncertain.

Dean Stanley, of whom Sir George speaks in terms of the utmost reverence and affection, was ever a true and dear friend, and made him his literary executor. Sir George accompanied Stanley to America in September, 1878. In a letter to the Queen, just before his departure, the Dean wrote: "My old and tried friend, Mr. Grove, goes with me." In his "Sinai and Palestine," his "Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church," in the second edition of his work on the "Epistles to the Corinthians," and elsewhere, Stanley acknowledged with "unfailing pleasure" the careful assistance his friend had rendered him in all questions connected with sacred history and geography.

But to resume the incidents of Sir George's varied life. After nearly twenty years of splendid service at the Crystal Palace, he resigned the secretaryship (at the end of 1873), having accepted an offer from Messrs. Macmillan and Co. to an important position on their editorial staff. He edited Macmillan's Magazine, and wrote a primer of geography for Macmillan's "History Primers," which a high-school teacher assures us is "a capital little book," and which has been translated into French.

By far the most important outcome of his connection with Macmillan's house was the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," which, more than any other of his achievements, will hand down the name of George Grove to posterity. Moreover, the idea of the work was entirely his own. The prospectus of the "Dictionary," dated March, 1874, began by saying that

> The want of English works on the history, theory, or practice of Music, or the biographies of musicians accessible to the non-professional reader, has long been a subject of remark. The "Biographical Dictionary of Musicians," the latest English book of the kind, was published in 1827, and even for that date is very incomplete. Dr. Callcott's "Grammar of Music," though issued in 1817, is the latest attempt to give a general account of the forms and terms of the art in a popular style. But to Dr. Callcott modern instrumental music was [naturally] a terra incognita—the name of Beethoven occurs only once in the entire volume.

After referring to the absence of any one work in English from which an intelligent enquirer could learn all he wanted to know, either in regard to technical or biographical musical matters, it continued:

> Such questions are now constantly occurring to those who five-and-twenty years ago would never have thought of them. Within that period music in England has made immense progress, and the number of persons who attend concerts and practise music has very largely increased. It is no longer regarded as a mere idle amusement, but has taken, or is taking, its right place beside the other Arts as an object of study and investigation. The demand for such information as that mentioned above is therefore naturally great.

The work was originally designed not to exceed two volumes of about 600 pages each—it is now in four volumes, containing in all 3,125 pages, exclusive of the Index of 188 pages. Not only was Sir George Grove the editor of this indispensable work, but his masterly biographies of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Schubert are models of biographical literature, and are written in a most fascinating style. He made two special journeys to Germany to obtain materials for his Mendelssohn article, and more than two to Vienna in connection with Schubert and Beethoven. We may perhaps be forgiven if we Purcellize the "Dictionary" by speaking of it thuswise: "In these delightful pleasant (pages of) Grove's."

We have traced our friend's career in various spheres and hemispheres, and now only one more stage has to be recorded. When the Royal College of Music was founded, in 1883, the Prince of Wales, with that keen, practical insight into men and things which is so characteristic of him, appointed "George Grove, Esquire, of Sydenham, Kent," Director of the Institution of which the Prince was, and is, the President. Sir George's work at the Royal College is too familiar to be recounted here. Suffice it to say that the old enthusiasm was thrown into the duties of this responsible post and the often difficult work at Kensington Gore. Sir George's view of his relation to the College was founded on the idea which he ventilated in his first address to the newly elected scholars in 1883, that the College was a family and that he was their father. He was accustomed often to refer to this idea, and it assisted him more or less to the last and gave rise to many a touching allusion or appeal in his addresses to the pupils at the beginning of each term. The relation between them was one of affection and mutual esteem. It was after the opening of the new College building, the generous gift of Mr. Samson Fox, on May 2, 1894, that Sir George received the distinction of Companion of the Bath, an honour very rarely conferred on those who have not previously been in the employment of the Government. After having served the College well, and after the death of his close and valued friend, Mr. George Watson, he, increasingly feeling the burden of his years, resigned his Directorship at Christmas, 1894. He speaks with affection of the many delightful letters he constantly receives from old students in his retirement. Long may they continue to assure him of an esteem which is shared by all who are privileged to enjoy his friendship, his counsel, and his love.

We ask Sir George about some of the eminent people he has met. He tells one or two funny stories of Costa. After the fire at Covent Garden Theatre (March 5, 1856) a series of opera concerts was given at the Crystal Palace, each part of which contained an overture. The duty of rehearsing the band was discharged by Sainton. One day Costa said to Sir George: "Is there any particular thing you would like to hear?" "Yes, I should like to hear Beethoven's overture to 'Coriolan,'" was the reply. Costa said that although he did not know it, it should be done. As he did not rehearse the band, and had not previously seen the score, he really conducted it prima vista. When Sir George thanked him, Costa replied: "I will never play that overture again. It ends pianissimo.—You cannot make an effect!" Costa was an excellent cook in the culinary sense, though not in "cooking up" the works of the great masters. Once Sir George dined with him, when the great conductor had cooked the entire meal. Some years later, at the Piccolo Sentinello, at Casamicciola, on the island of Ischia, in the great conductor's native air, Sir George witnessed the amusing sight of Costa and his brother, with their serviettes tucked under their chins, sitting opposite to one another and eating an enormous mass of macaroni out of a large wash-hand basin!

At one of the Crystal Palace concerts in 1869 Sir George had as his companion Madame Sabatier-Ungher, the original contralto singer in the first performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony (May 7, 1824). She told Sir George how that Beethoven, being so deaf, did not hear the applause at the end, and was unconscious of the delight of the audience till she turned him round to face the people. It must have been most interesting to hear this pathetic incident from the lips of one who was so thoughtful on that unique occasion. Sir George knew Mr. J. W. Davison very intimately. Some of the pseudonyms of "J. W. D." were very funny—e.g., "Mr. Ap Mutton," "Dishley Peters," "Shaver Silver," "Dr. A. S. Silent," "Septimus Wind (M.D.)," and "Drinkwater Hard." Sir George's own designation in the Musical World was "Sir Flamborough Head, Bart."

Sitting in the gallery at a concert at St. James's Hall one day, Sir George espied someone peering through the glass panel of the door leading downstairs. "Who is that engaging looking young man?" he enquired. "Oh! that's Sullivan," was the reply, "he's just come back from Leipzig." A friendship between the two men was quickly formed which soon became very steadfast. It was at the Crystal Palace that Sir Arthur was really first brought before the English public as a composer, when his charming "Tempest" music was performed, April 5, 1862, and repeated on the following Saturday. While Sullivan was writing his "Sapphire Necklace" he took rooms over a shop in Sydenham Road, to be near his kind friend Grove, at whose house he almost lived. At a later period another of Sir George's "young men" stayed, with Sullivan, under his roof. He was a fellow student of Sullivan's at Leipzig, and the two young musicians made much music together, always sure of a deeply sympathetic listener. The name of the other was Franklin Taylor, who is still one of Sir George's most constant allies.

In 1880 Sir George Grove was the recipient of a most gratifying testimonial, presented to him, at St. James's Hall, by the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Tait) in the presence of a distinguished company of men, eminent in art, science, and literature. The following address on that occasion speaks for itself:

To George Grove, Esq.

We, the undersigned, ask you to accept the accompanying purse of one thousand guineas and gold chronometer, which we offer you as a token of our appreciation of the great services which you have rendered, in the first place, to Biblical History and Geography, by your valuable contributions to the Dictionary of the Bible, and by your labours in connection with the foundation of the Palestine Exploration Fund; in the second place, to Music and Musical Literature during your long association with the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts, and more recently by the production of the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians."

In these and many other fields of research in art and literature you have earned the gratitude of your countrymen at large and the high esteem and friendship of all those associated with you in your labours, and we welcome this opportunity of testifying in a manner however inadequate our gratitude, friendship, and esteem.

J. W. Davison characteristically concluded his report of the proceedings in the Musical World thus:

Hoch! Hoch! Hoch! Camerlingo Grovio! Hoch! Candor dat viribus alas, would be thy fitting motto.

D. P. ["Dishley Peters."]

A man's letters to his intimates invariably furnish an index to his temperament and sympathies. This is abundantly true of Sir George. Of the many communications one receives, those from him are amongst the few that would be kept and treasured. And this leads us to refer to his kind-heartedness. Some successful men, themselves having been helped in their struggling days, forget (to speak charitably) to show the same consideration to those who need a helping-hand. Not so our friend. A request, however deferentially made, is met with the outburst, "Of course, my dear fellow, I shall be only too pleased. Tell me what I am to say, or do." There are many, feeling deeply grateful to him, who will reverence his memory long after he has "crost the bar."

In addition to the works named throughout this imperfect narrative, Sir George has translated Guizot's "Etudes sur les Beaux-Arts." His sketch, "The Nabloos and the Samaritans," in Sir Francis Galton's "Travels" (Ward, Lock and Co.'s Minerva Library), records a very interesting episode of Sir George's Palestine experiences. It would occupy too much of our space to enumerate in detail the many prefaces which he has contributed to musical books. Fortunate the author who gains his valuable imprimatur in the way of a "send off." He has also been a frequent correspondent and contributor to The Times, Pall Mall Gazette, Spectator, and other periodicals.

Sir George Grove is decorated with the Cross of the Order of Merit, conferred on him by the present Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. He is also an Hon. D.C.L. of Durham and LL.D. of Glasgow. He was knighted, at the same time as his friends Arthur Sullivan and George A. Macfarren, at Windsor, on May 22, 1883, and was made a Companion of the Bath in 1894, as already stated, upon his retirement from the Directorship of the Royal College of Music. He is a Member of the Athenæum Club, one of the Council of the Royal College of Music, and an original Member of the Musical Association.

We have now come to the end of this inadequate sketch of a very remarkable man. Words of our own would be too poor to be the final utterance in regard to him in these columns. We therefore conclude with a quotation of peculiar applicability in the words of his dear old friend, Dean Stanley, who said to an American audience:

"When you read at the end of some elaborate essay on the history of music, or on Biblical geography, the name of George Grove, you will recall with pleasure the incessant questionings, the eager desire for knowledge, the wide and varied capacity for all manner of instruction which you experience in your conversation with him."

VICTORIAN MUSIC.

Orchestral Music.—II.

In considering the influence of Sir Michael Costa upon orchestral music and its performance, one soon finds that the subject-matter divides itself into two parts: first, Costa as an arranger; second, Costa as a conductor. I am afraid that, since "the evil which men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones," Michael Costa is chiefly remembered in some quarters as a man without reverence—one who did as he pleased with the compositions entrusted to him for production, and often brutally sacrificed them on the altar of noise. He lies perfectly open to the charge. Costa allowed himself a free hand, even with the greatest masters, and an orchestral hullabaloo was sweet and refreshing to his ears. He loved the trombones as William the Conqueror loved the "tall deer." If there were no parts for trombones and the bass drum, he sometimes wrote them; the composer's intention being quite a matter of indifference. I am not going to say that this weakness was strength, nor will it be expected of me by any who know how, for long years, I have protested against "touching up the masters." But Costa should have whatever benefit arises to him from the fact that he does not stand alone either in his tampering with scores or his love of noise. Some of his accusers forget this when they have nothing but praise for arrangers who fill up Handel's silent bars, and for composers who would unchain the tempests of heaven, if they could, to make a greater assault upon our ears. Costa, I grant, was personally inexcusable. But he was only one of many who shared his tastes and practised his methods. He and his contemporaries have disappeared; would that I could declare them to have left no successors. That, however, is impossible while the brutalities of the huge modern orchestra continue.

It is chiefly with Costa as a chef d'orchestre that I have here to do, and in that capacity he assuredly deserves honour and gratitude. The unflinching Neapolitan disciplined the "band." I do not know what the orchestras of Southern Italy were like when Costa was a young man and the amiable Zingarelli flourished. But whether through recollection of what he had seen, or through a keen perception of necessity, he set himself to raise the English orchestra from the condition of a "fortuitous concourse of atoms" to that of a homogeneous body, subordinate to one will—his own. There is much to say for the men whom he so effectually curbed and then attached to himself by the ties of admiration and respect. They were very capable performers with more than wit enough to perceive that the typical conductor of their day was a poor creature with no real qualifications for leadership. He knew that himself, and a sense of shortcoming made him careful not to assert a measure of authority likely to provoke reprisals. It was, "Gentlemen, please!" with him. Very often the gentlemen did not please, save in their own good time. They took their nominal master down a peg by way of asserting themselves against the fate which had placed them under him. Costa ended all that by force of capacity and will, aided by a rigid sense of justice which secured the respect even of those who at any time suffered from it. He himself set an example of strict regard for regulation. Insisting upon punctuality in others, Costa took care to be punctual himself. Demanding serious attention to the work in hand, he never relaxed in the discharge of his own duties. A severe disciplinarian, he so behaved as that he could punish offences with clean hands. He knew, moreover, how to command. Never "hey, fellow, well met" with subordinates, he lost no opportunity of showing himself their friend. In battles with managers he acted as the leader of his men, and if, when they offended, there was little hope of escaping reprimand, there was equally small chance of being overlooked if they deserved encouragement and approbation. His manner has been described as stern; it was rather one of calm dignity which at times apparently became impassiveness. From this Costa would, on rare occasions descend, but no one presumed upon the moment without misgivings. Apropos, a good story used to be told in orchestral circles. At one time the late John Ella played a second violin in the opera orchestra, where the largeness of his pretensions, coupled with comparatively humble functions, occasioned no little amusement. Ella was fond of saying that the English orchestra stood vastly below that of the Paris opera at all points, but especially in the matter of attack. The coup d'archet in Ella's lips at last becoming irritating, his comrades proceeded to consider a device whereby to remove it. Their plan formed, the blow was struck one day at rehearsal. At a certain point in the overture all the violins were required to enter fortissimo, and as the moment approached every bow was raised. Down came the chief's baton, but the only response was a feeble cluck from the violin of Ella. The bow of no other player had moved. A roar of laughter from the entire orchestra followed, and even Costa relaxed his set face into a smile, which, waxing broader and broader, made the mirth louder and more confident. Ella spoke no more of the coup d'archet, and Costa caused it to be known that no such practical joke would again be tolerated.

The effect of Costa's discipline extended in some measure to the performances given under his baton. Even in the execution of the music the conductor's sense of order, precision, unanimity, made itself felt. This was inevitable, for in no work done by a combination of persons do those qualities in the leader so readily display themselves through the efforts of his subordinates. Only on very rare occasions indeed could a performance under Costa be charged with carelessness, and those occasions were, as a rule, connected with works he cordially disliked. He had all a Southern Italian's strength of feeling. Passionately loving Rossini and the masters of his own country, as was natural, he hated with no less intensity some other composers who shocked his sense of artistic propriety. When the works of such men were in hand, he treated them, it must be confessed, with an indifferent feeling, against which, I verily believe, his will to be conscientious struggled hard. In this, however, he by no means stood alone. Every conductor has his partialities, and they inevitably show themselves, though not often so ostentatiously as when Wagner, at a Philharmonic concert, put on gloves to conduct a work of Mendelssohn; taking them off when he had done and throwing them on the ground. Exceptions apart, whatever Costa's hand found to do was done with all his might. Sometimes he did too much.

No one, I take it, will ever write a chapter on Costa's "readings." His work was practically over when the modern conductor, charged with the duty of evolving new meanings from old texts, made his appearance. Costa had no such mission. He read his scores for what was obvious in them, and, reading nothing into them, was therewith content. On these lines, and backed up by followers as devoted as they were able, Costa often secured splendid performances of orchestral works. Granted that his tactics were as old fashioned as those at Waterloo—"The French came on in the old way," said the Duke, "and we beat them back in the old way"—the result was often as conclusive as Wellington's victory. Nobody will deny this who can remember the effect of the overture to "Guillaume Tell," when played under Costa at the Birmingham Festival. For dash, precision, unity of feeling and spirit, and for tonal magnificence, that effect has never been surpassed.

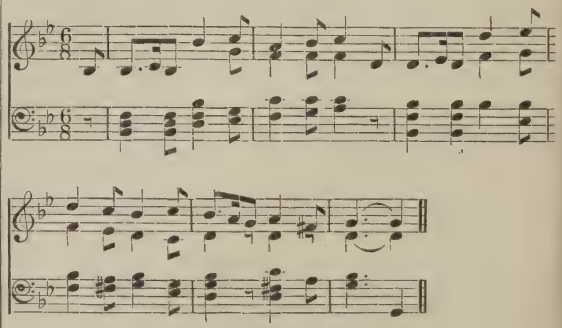
I have devoted none too much space to him who did for the English orchestra what Carnot accomplished for the French revolutionary levies—to him who "organised victory." Costa stood at the first parting of the ways in the path of orchestral music amongst us, and he led in the right direction. He had his faults, being only a man; his virtues lifted himself and those under him from the following of an employment to the discharge of a vocation. So he prepared the way for others who came after and made their work lighter.

I must speak here of another conductor contemporary with Costa—Alfred Mellon, to wit. Circumstances kept this orchestral chief on a lower level than the highest, but his qualifications were unmistakable. His was the great gift of what we call, for lack of a better name, personal magnetism. Beloved by those who knew him on account of the qualities which make up a good fellow, he brought to his work infectious enthusiasm, and an insight so remarkable that he appeared to see at a glance the scope and bearing of any music confided to him for production. No man was followed more zealously and dutifully than this English leader. But his influence was not what it might have been, for reasons unnecessary to discuss. Nevertheless, Alfred Mellon is worthy to be held in remembrance, and to be associated with Costa as one of the two conductors who, through many years of the Queen's reign, showed special and eminent qualifications for their work.



There remains for me to discuss the latest phase of orchestral music in England—that, namely, which came in with Hans Richter. This task may be reserved for another occasion.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY.

I can refrain no longer. I have waited till the last faint echoes of the Jubilee have died away, and with them has died within my breast the fond and futile hope that one of our glorious band of Victorian musicians would do something—a tiny something—to celebrate adequately this unique event. But no, there is nothing. You cannot call—or at least I do not call—Sir George Martin's anthem, Sir Arthur Sullivan's hymn, and the revival of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's beautiful Jubilee Ode sufficient commemoration of our sixty years of musical progress. Was it too much to hope that one at least of our titled band should have justified his honour by dazzling the public ear with really noble music? It seems so; yet the thing was so very easy to do. I would have done it myself and won an undying name as easily as falling downstairs, but for the fact that I have long foresworn high-class composition as too expensive a hobby. Yet I do not mind indicating sketchily how the thing could have been achieved (in case there should be any jealous wretches found to throw doubts on my powers), and I am sure you will all join with me in grieving over this lost opportunity.

The composer who really intended to rise to the occasion of the Diamond Jubilee would of course have confined his efforts to utilising our National Anthem in a really able fashion. What! There was too much of it as it was, you say? But that's just it; no one attempted to bearbeiten it, as the Germans say; we had to swallow it raw all the time. And no tune is anything more than a tune until the competent musician comes along and shows people what can be done with it. And what could I not have done with it? What a mine of rich material does "God save the Queen" offer to the artistic and inventive genius! It is indeed not even a festive tune as it stands. It is solemn, religious, fervent, and patriotic if you like, but not gay, and people wanted to be happy on Jubilee day. Then why not have reverted to the simple methods of sixty years ago, when they used to turn everything—even Handel's "Messiah"—into quadrilles? The Jubilee Quadrilles would have uplifted the hearts (and soles) of all hearers if the first figure had only commenced thus:—

I need not give it all; the pattern once set, any common or garden band-master will complete the work for you; but if a less cheerful version should happen to be required, say by the unsuccessful speculators in seats, here is one in which the original melody remains unaltered, the harmony being merely shifted into the relative minor. Observe the effect of pious resignation conveyed by the chaste triplet accompaniment—

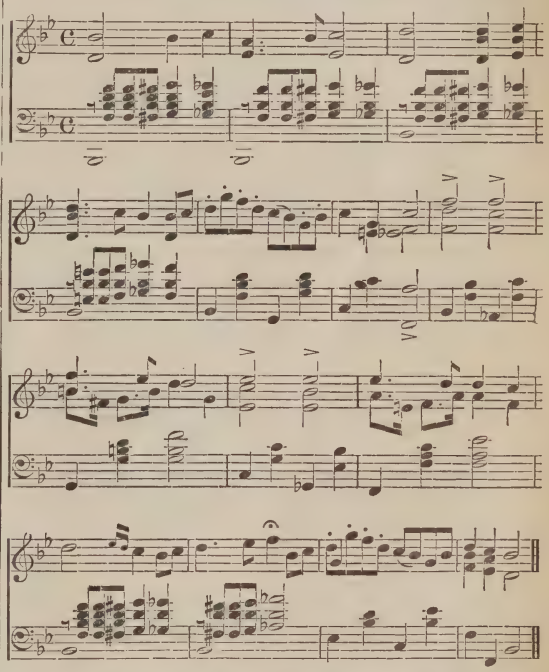
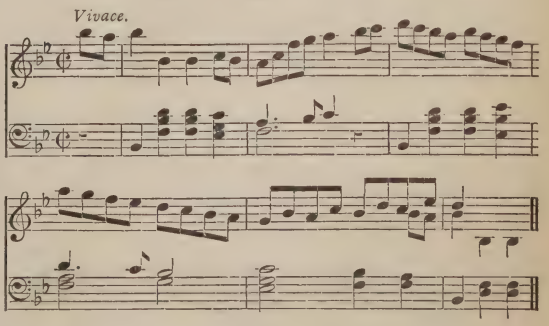
Then, again, one would have expected that so good a musician as the organist of St. Paul's Cathedral would have seized his opportunity and utilised the National Anthem to good purpose. If he wanted to show his science he could easily have made a canon four in one in the fifth and octave. (It doesn't in the least matter how a canon sounds, so long as it is a canon)—

Or, again, he could have simply harmonised it in the subdominant with entirely novel effect, thus—



The few bars which alone I have room to quote convey but a slight idea of the harmonic possibilities of the tune. A sudden chord of D flat would perhaps be the best thing to follow, giving the true ecclesiastical local colour. I might have harmonised the whole in G flat or some equally unnatural key, after the fashion of Grieg in his later works, but this would hardly be decent in church music.



What can the authorities have been about, I wonder, not to realise that a special kind of music was required for the East-Enders? The inhabitants of Whitechapel and the Borough came from far-off lands to pay their duty to their Sovereign; the least that could have been done was for the royal trumpets to greet them with the familiar call—and then to still further ingratiate the masses by a "coster" (not Costa) version of the anthem. This I must really quote entire: there are those who in their admiration for it have called me the Rudyard Kipling of music—

Again, it would have been perfectly practicable to have fitted out each section of the Jubilee procession with an appropriate piece of music, which should still be our old friend in fresh disguises. The Blue-jackets, for instance, who went to clear the way, should have had a nautical version of this kind—into the continuation of which snatches of "Pinafore" and the "Britannia" Overture can be made to twine very gracefully. Then the Life Guards ought to have had a quick-step, which is unavoidably conventional at first—for no quick-step dares begin in any other style, but I find that the second part (where the melody always has to come on the bass trombone, you know) glides off into the Finale of Schubert's C major Symphony unless you take great care. Nothing would have been easier than to have supplied an Eastern version for the use of the Indian troops: not one of those real Hindoo distortions which The Musical Times printed a few years ago, but the sort of Indian music you get in a French opera, and which the public much prefer to the genuine article—

Finally, as a really "popular number," those colonial wild riders in the big boots ought to have had a noisy version modelled upon the famous "Walkürenritt," a few bars of which I must give to indicate the style—

You see what can be got out of that simple tune by dint of a little musicianship—and brains. And I have not shown you half the things I could do with it. All the decorations and illuminations, and most of the seats, could have been made out of the material there is in that inexhaustible melody, and then you might have picked up of what remained enough basketsful to feed all the outcasts in the parks. But the lack of energy and enterprise among our composers is quite disgusting and disheartening. I am glad I don't belong to them.

FROM MY STUDY.

Timely use may now be made of an extract from the memoirs of the Margravine of Anspach. This lady was the youngest daughter of Augustus, fourth Earl of Berkeley. She married, in the first instance, Mr. (afterwards Lord) Craven, and, in the next place, the Margrave of Anspach. But the extract has to do with her maiden days, when she was the "toast" of Gloucestershire. Here it is:

"In the summer after the grand fête at Berkeley, there was a music-meeting at Gloucester, to which I went with Lady Berkeley (her stepmother). An unexpected summons came to me to request that I would leave the pew where I was, and hold one of the plates for the money collected for the poor, at one of the doors of the Cathedral. This requisition was made by desire of the Bishop of Gloucester, and to this door all the gentlemen of the three counties rushed to get a sight at the young novelty. As I naturally must have felt abashed at such a situation, where I was so very conspicuous, the consequence was that I averted my face when I curtsied for the guineas that were given, and they all fell sliding from the plate, to the entire dismay of the two beadles who attended. So great was my confusion at this unlucky circumstance that, on my return to the Bishop's palace, where I was staying, I was obliged to retire to my bedroom, where I remained to cry and sob at my misfortune. It was only Lord Berkeley (her brother) who could rouse me, by telling me peremptorily that I must go to the ball, where I was again mortified because he scolded me for refusing to dance with an odious Baronet, whom he liked and I hated because he had ventured to tell me that he was in love with me; and as there were others who talked love to me I disliked them all."

Poor young creature! what a delightful chapter Thackeray might have written concerning Elizabeth Berkeley's Festival experience!

In "Literary Anecdotes of the Nineteenth Century," edited by W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D., and Thomas J. Wise (1895), are a number of previously unpublished letters from Shelley to Leigh Hunt. In one of these epistles I find a paragraph of some musical interest. It explains itself:—

"There is one subject connected with the actual state of my financial imbecility about which I wish your assistance. I believe the bills for my piano and for yours came due this year (1820). Of course you know that in the question of a just debt I am totally incapable of taking advantage of my residence abroad, and especially in a debt so contracted. But I have not the money to pay it instantly. Could you solicit for me a renewal of it? Of course the pianoforte maker is (? not) afraid of the ultimate payment or I would do anything he requires to assure him of it further. And I would consent to make him any compensation he chose for the delay; and if he will accept nothing of that kind will do my best when it is in my power to make him no loser by his forbearance. I forget how the affair was arranged, but if I rightly recollect it was through Novello's mediation. I cannot but be anxious to stand well in the estimation of so excellent and friendly a person as Novello, and I should therefore consider it as a special act of friendship in you to explain this business, and arrange it for me without loss of time."

It seems rather a wild notion to employ as a business agent a man who could not keep his own affairs straight, and I regret, for the sake of baulked curiosity, that no further information as to this financial difficulty is forthcoming. Query: did Shelley make himself responsible for Leigh Hunt's pianoforte? It is not at all unlikely that he did.

In the same volume of "Literary Anecdotes" may be found what I take to be almost the only sonnet ever addressed to the pianoforte. It is there published for the first time, and bears date February 13, 1871.

Nobly, Piano, hast thou held thy p'ace
(Inspired by brain-and-heart-enkindled hands)
In strength, in sweetness, majesty and grace,
Beside the frame loud bruited in the lands,
In which it higher laud than thee commands:
Unjustly, seems it: I would rather hear,
In the rapt stillness of this peopled room,
From thy roused depths—when, even as now, informed
By this High Priestess of thy mysteries—
Beethoven's Pathos and dread March of doom,
In their great melodies and harmonies,
Then from all sound-shrines gather'd to one sphere,
In Palace or in full throng'd Theatre.

This sonnet in pronounced favour of the household instrument is the work of Thomas Wade (1805-1875), a poet of unquestionable genius, who lived too near the dazzling light of Shelley for all his worth to be discerned. Wade several times turned his pen to musical themes, for the reason, perhaps, that he married a pianist, Mrs. Browning, née Eager, who is described as "the daughter of a musician, who entered the musical profession at the age of fifteen, and remained in it till almost the end of her long life." This lady died in 1882. Among Wade's musical sonnets is one in which he curiously balances the service which Love renders to Music against that which Music renders to Love. It is a somewhat subtle process:

Ah! Music in an atmosphere of Love
A portion of the soul of Love becometh;
The heard deep-blended with the harmony
That is unheard, but to the touch and eye
And innermost spirit of sweet life revealed:
But in an atmosphere of Music, Love
Is lost, and wilder'd from the simpleness
Of its most silent bliss—a murmuring dove,
In the dim woods which have its joys conceal'd,
By the loud chant of flocking birds invaded;
A calm wildflower, that in soft fragrance bloometh,
By morn and eve divinely dew'd and shaded,
In Art's strong perfumes drenched. Ah, strangely less Doth Love sweet Music serve than Music Love.

In another sonnet, headed, "Written after Hearing great Music," Wade pays a fine tribute to the talent of his wife:

Pianoforte! ne'er before, perchance,
Thy alien name with English verse was blent;
But now 'tis meet thou to that place advance,
As rival to whatever instrument:
This Priestess of thy spirit-mysteries
Makes thee oracular; and harmonies
Soar from beneath her touch, which sing aloud
Of things imagined, but not seen nor known:
The rush of angels' wings; the flit of elves;
The creatures of the rainbow and bright cloud;
And the lov'd Dead, who in our dreams appear:
Cramer and Hummel, 'tis believed, are gone;
Yet in this heaven-of-sound we seem to hear
Not echoes of them, but their living selves.

During my holiday season I have been a belated reader of George Somes Layard's "Life and Letters of Charles Samuel Keene." The interest of that chatty and entertaining book was not lessened to me by finding that the famous artist of Punch was a devoted amateur of music. "Though he went rarely to the opera," says Mr. Layard, "Keene was very fond of music, and mostly of old vocal music. His tuning-fork was always ready to his hand, and when he chanced to pick up any fragment of old minstrelsy he would often begin to hum it over while he breakfasted. He had a fine bass voice, and sung for some years in the chorus of the Handel Festival, where I happened to sit near him. He likewise was a member of the Henry Leslie Choir and of the merry Moray Minstrels, and although he very seldom cared to sing a solo, his 'Three Ravens' proved delightful both for quality of tone and pathos of expression." Keene withdrew from Leslie's choir when that body took to the performance of larger works than madrigals, part-songs, and motets. In his case it was a question of taste, but in mine—I protested as strongly as I could against the change—the motive of action was one of policy. Undoubtedly it started the choir downhill. Keene had many other strings to his bow. I read: "In addition to the above associations, he was a member of a choral class established by the late Charles Horsley, the meetings of which were held in Hanover Square on Tuesday evenings, over Wenzel's music shop. He was also a member of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Catch, Glee, and Canon Club, and the Bach Society. During the later years of his life, however, he dropped his memberships, and the only society to which he belonged at the time of his death was the Western Madrigal Society, the practice meetings of which are held at the house of the Royal Society of Musicians, Lisle Street, Leicester Square."

It is remarkable and, to me, incomprehensible that a man of such musical taste as the above facts indicate should become fond of that instrument of torture, the Scotch bagpipes. Keene was, however, a fantastic sort of person, and should not, perhaps, be taken very seriously in all matters. Of his enthusiasm for the "Piob mohr" there can be no doubt, since his strange passion entailed sacrifice. As a devotee of the bagpipes he was not a desirable neighbour, and probably for that reason he had once or twice to change his studio. Moreover, he ran the risk of being taken in charge as a wandering lunatic when he made a dumb chanter out of the leg of a chair and took to the practice of fingering when riding on the tops of omnibuses. Then he began collecting bagpipe music, and even specimens of the dreadful machine itself. Yet he had not a drop of Scotch blood in his veins. To Scotland he would go, however, for there he could skirl away to his heart's content, cheered by the appreciation of admiring natives. In the less favourable atmosphere of England, Keene had to restrain his ardour. He once wrote to a friend: "I met an amateur practising in Hyde Park the other night, about eleven o'clock. I wish I had the cheek to do that." Again: "I am looking forward to a visit to the Highlands this year. . . . I shall take my pipes, in the hopes of finding a lonely glen to practise in. That's the worst of the instrument; grateful as its acid nasal tone is to my own ear, I'm of a compunctious disposition and I'm always more comfortable in playing out of earshot. What I sigh for is a tract of lonely sea-shore on a hard sand." Poor fellow! He was just the man to be cast away on Robinson Crusoe's island, especially as a blast of the fearful pipes would have scared away the savages. Truly it must be said that bagpipers take themselves and their instruments very seriously; not without reason if there was ever such a scene as we find in Louis Stephenson's "Kidnapped." The reader will at once have in mind the bagpipe duel between Robin Oig, son of Rob Roy, and Alan Stewart. These two had nearly come to the point of dirk and the edge of claymore when Duncan Maclaren diverted them to weapons less dangerous. "Here are my pipes, and here are you two gentlemen who are baith acclaimed pipers. It's an auld dispute which one of ye's the best. Here will be a braw chance to settle it." A little more squabbling and matters calmed down to the trial of skill. Robin took the pipes and played a little spring in a very ranting manner. "Aye, ye can blow," said Alan, and, taking the instrument from his rival, he first played the same spring in a manner identical with Robin's, and then wandered into variations, which, as he went on, he decorated with a perfect flight of grace-notes, such as pipers love and call the "warblers." . . . "That's no very bad, Mr. Stewart," said the rival, "but ye show a poor device in your warblers." "Me!" cried Alan, the blood starting to his face, "I give ye the lie." "Do ye own yourself beaten at the pipes, then," said Robin, "that ye seek to change them for the sword?" Alan takes back the lie, and the duel goes on, to the advantage of Robin, who at last struck into the slow measure of a pibroch. "It was a fine piece of music in itself, and nobly played; but it seems besides it was a piece peculiar to the Appin Stewarts, and a chief favourite with Alan. The first notes were scarce out before there came a quick change in his face; when the time quickened he seemed to grow restless in his seat, and long before that piece was at an end the last signs of his anger died from him, and he had no thought but for the music. "Robin Oig," he said, when it was done, "ye are a great piper. I'm not fit to blow in the same kingdom with ye. Body of me! ye have mair music in your sporran than I have in my head. And though it still sticks in my mind that I could maybe show ye another of it with the cold steel, I warn ye before hand—it'll no be fair. It would go against my heart to haggle a man that can blow the pipes as you can." So the quarrel was made up, and the dirks remained unreddened. Bravo, bagpipes! X.

FASHIONABLE INSTRUMENTS.

The vicissitudes of what may be called fashionable instruments furnish the materials for a curious, if not exactly edifying study. Roughly speaking, the requirements demanded in a fashionable instrument may be reduced to two simple desiderata—the maximum of simplicity in execution, combined, in the case of the female executant, with suitable opportunities for picturesque and becoming attitudes. Thus one can never imagine, on the one hand, an instrument like the oboe, or, on the other, like the trombone, ever attaining popularity amongst the young bloods of Belgravia or the decorative damsels of Mayfair. But these restrictions, though regrettable from an artistic point of view, are not without certain compensating moral advantages. Thus it undoubtedly conduces to the solidarity of our social system, to the obliteration of caste or class prejudices, that an instrument like the penny whistle, cheap, yet of a most penetrating timbre, should find equal favour with the tattered guttersnipe and the gilded aristocrat. For the locus classicus on the penny whistle as the instrument of the democracy we must refer our readers to the pages of the ever-to-be-lamented R. L. Stevenson's "Wrong Box." But to the unquestioned vogue which this instrument has occasionally achieved amid the marble halls of semi-sultanic luxury—the phrase is not ours, it is borrowed from an American reporter—no fashionable novelist has hitherto paid due attention. It is true that the instrument is not exactly romantic: one does not associate it readily with rope ladders or serenades. But this is not a romantic age, and there is a certain affinity between the shrill, aggressive tones of the penny whistle and the strident tones and assertive egotism of the modern man and woman of fashion. Up to the present time it has been cultivated only sporadically, but we should not be surprised if the dawning of the twentieth century were to witness a vast increase in the number of its votaries. In this context we may be pardoned for inserting an authentic anecdote, which we give on the authority of a gentleman living in the neighbourhood, and which, so far as we are aware, has never yet emerged into the publicity of print. Down in Somersetshire there is a small village which prepared to do honour to the Jubilee last June, but was not able to run to the expense of a band. A local farmer, however, nobly came to the rescue. He purchased seventy penny whistles, which were duly distributed amongst the youth of the neighbourhood, and, a few preliminary rehearsals having been held, they marched through the village on Jubilee Day whistling the National Anthem for all they were worth. It must have been an experience not easily to be forgotten by the natives. For the rest it may serve to illustrate how successfully mere din appeals to the juvenile mind. And here, again, we find a compact solidarity between the masses and the classes. As Mr. Jerome observed the other day, no one can deny that children, whether from the West-End or the slums, dearly love a noise, and he supplements this observation with an interesting anecdote drawn from his own experience. "I remember," he writes, "a children's party that was going very slowly. Juggling tricks were tried, and the children told each other how it was done, and seemed bored. A magic lantern was introduced, and the children yawned. Forfeits were held till the children said they were tired, and did not want forfeits. Something had to be done to cheer them. A man with a knowledge of human nature came along, and he proposed a menagerie. Each child was given the part of some wild beast, and the beasts were selected chiefly with regard to their natural noisiness. The lecturer explained that the hyæna was remarkable for its shrill, ear-piercing irritating laugh. All the children wanted to be hyænas. A family of hyænas was appointed, father, mother, and twins, and I must say that no family of real hyænas could have produced a laugh more shrill, ear-piercing, and irritating, or have kept it up longer. The rôle of lion was given to a broad-chested youngster, and he roared steadily for the rest of the afternoon. Tigers and panthers were also popular, and the little girls did parrots and cockatoos. The ennui disappeared by magic. Every child took up its part with enthusiasm, and played it for all it was worth. It was the most successful children's party I have ever witnessed." What is true of children is, with certain limitations, true of adults, especially aristocratic adults. The strongholds of Philistinism in music are not to be found in Suburbia, but in the heart of the West-End, where the old prejudice against the professional musician has not altogether died out. For many years the fashionable instrument par excellence was the banjo. Now, if we are correctly informed, an effort is being made to instal the bagpipes, Irish as well as Scottish, in the place of honour. Strange to say, Ireland is not altogether enchanted at the prospect. Thus the Dublin Evening Mail, in some editorial notes on the subject, adopts a most unsympathetic attitude. "Irish ideas," says the writer, "are penetrating into London in various forms, but none more formidable than in the introduction of our bagpipes into social circles. Next to the Scottish screechers, they are the most terrible of all instruments, and unless brought into a room for the purpose of clearing it when all other expedients have been tried in vain, or to tone down the feeling in favour of Ireland which has grown up since the royal visit, and undo its effect, there can be no intelligible motive for such a craze in fashionable life." If it be true, which is rather a revelation to us, that the Irish pipes are marked by their sonority of tone, that quality is certainly calculated to enhance their popularity as a fashionable instrument. For while the aristocratic amateur frequently looks upon the efforts of professional musicians chiefly in the light of an obbligato accompaniment to general conversation, he by no means adopts a similar standpoint in regard to his own performances. Here, however, there can be little doubt of the superiority of the Scottish over the Irish pipes in sheer sonority of tone, although it has been insinuated by an unpatriotic Celt that St. Patrick employed the latter with lethal effect in his historic extermination of the snakes and other reptiles.

The number of instruments suitable for fashionable circles by their timbre and the amount of skill which they involve on the part of the performer is, as we have already observed, somewhat restricted, but it can hardly be said that they have all received that attention to which they are entitled. Take, for instance, the triangle, an instrument, it is true, somewhat limited in compass and tone colour, but wonderfully simple in manipulation, and capable, in the hands of an energetic performer, of a truly stimulating effect. Thus an excellent and educational pastime consists of playing a simple tune on the triangle, the identity of which has to be discovered by the audience by the rhythm alone. Another unjustly discarded instrument, which might be revived with great advantage, is the Jew's harp, the adorable simplicity of which is such that persons of the meanest intelligence can yet attain to positive virtuosity in its control within the space of half-an-hour. For dynamic gradations of tone the Jew's harp stands almost unrivalled, while its compact shape enables it to be carried in the waistcoat pocket without seriously affecting the sit of that garment. The Jew's harp, again, lends itself admirably to concerted music, and, in conjunction with the comb, another beautiful but somewhat ticklish instrument, has been known to stir indescribable emotion in the bosom of an overfed pug dog. The Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," performed by an expert combist, is indescribably luscious. But it is not given to everyone to excel on the comb, needing as it does the alliance of a rich fruity voice to a lip of exceptional imperturbability. We have read somewhere — but, alas! the reference has escaped us—how strains of ravishing beauty can be elicited from a teapot by blowing down the spout and regulating the pitch by opening or closing the lid. But here, again, a special training and temperament are required, as in the case of the famous performer who, many years ago, delighted large audiences by rapping out tunes on his chin with his fist. Whistling, pure and simple, without the aid of a tin cylinder, enjoyed a considerable vogue in exalted circles, and has not altogether passed out of fashion, but the art suffered in social prestige from the rise of the professional whistler, to say nothing of the fact that when practised by an expert performer it creates a serious draught. At a concert which the present writer once attended, in the St. James's Banqueting Hall, that apartment was converted into a veritable Cavern of Æolus by the efforts of a belle siffleuse of massive proportions and great lung power.

To conclude these discursive observations, we cannot help thinking that the invention of a new instrument, combining the qualities already insisted upon, would satisfy a long-felt want in the domestic circle of the affluent but unambitious amateur. We have indicated a few instruments which might be revived with great advantage, but revivals are never so attractive as novelties. Much, of course, depends on a name, and we gladly present the inventor, in advance, with the "Footle-horn" or the "Frivoloon" as appropriate designations for the new instrument.

Referring to the biographical sketch of Dr. E. J. Hopkins in our last issue, Mr. Robert A. Marr, of Edinburgh, calls our attention to the fact that Dr. Hopkins's uncle and Mr. Edward Lloyd's grandfather was the first bandmaster of the Scots Guards; and also that the military band of the regiment was "formed on the return of the regiment from Paris, after the occupation of that city by the Allies in 1815." In his interesting book "Music for the People" (Menzies, Edinburgh, 1889) Mr. Marr gives the following information in regard to the history of the band of the Grenadier Guards:

The history of the band of the Grenadier Guards may very fairly be stated to represent the growth of the military band in this country. Grose, in his "Military Antiquities of the British Army," states that the fife, as a band instrument, had been laid aside for a long time, but was restored about 1745, when the Duke of Cumberland introduced it into the Guards. Two fifers were allowed on the muster-roll of each regiment; but a stronger band was obtained by teaching the drummers to blow the fife as well as beat the drum. The band would thus consist of fifes, bugle-horns, and drums, the leader being the drum-major. Documents exist which prove that the instruments in use in 1772 were oboes, clarinets, French horns, bugle-horns, and bassoons; and in this we have the beginning of the formation of the military band, which in the case of the Grenadier Guards is believed to have been fully organised about the beginning of the century. It consisted of oboes, clarinets, French horns, bassoons, trumpets, and serpents, and the fifes and drums played occasionally with the band. At that time there were black "time-beaters," who played the bass drum, tenor drum, side-drum, and cymbals. Black "time-beaters" were then common in the British Army; they were continued as such for many years, and they dressed in a costume similar to that of the Zouaves.

Parke, in his "Musical Memoirs," tells us that about 1783 the bands of the three regiments of Guards consisted of only eight performers—viz., two oboes, two clarinets, two French horns, and two bassoons, selected from the King's and the Patent theatres. The then Duke of York, at the wish of the officers of the Guards, assented to the importation of a band "made in Germany," which, on its arrival, consisted of twenty-four players—viz., clarinets, oboes, French horns, flutes, bassoons, trumpets, trombones, and serpents. "The band," according to Parke, "also included three black men [made in Africa], two of whom carried tambourines, and the third the Turkish bells. . . . This band became very popular, and attracted crowds of persons to St. James's Park to listen to its performances." "It may be worthy of remark," continues Parke, "that the Africans, who appear generally to have a natural disposition for music, produced such an effect with their tambourines that those instruments afterwards, under their tuition, became extremely fashionable, and were cultivated by many of those belles of distinction who were emulous to display Turkish attitudes and Turkish graces." It would be interesting to know whether these musicians of colour in the Guards' bands are within living memory. Military music was very much in evidence during the recent Jubilee celebrations, and the military bands, cavalry and infantry, naturally attracted much attention. We venture to think that the historical side of this interesting subject, in regard to the British army, has not received the adequate treatment which it deserves. A history of British military music is much needed.

The centenary of the birth of Thomas Haynes Bayly falls on the 13th of the present month, he having been born at Bath, October 13, 1797. Bayly, who came of a good family, displayed a talent for verse at a very early age. He was first designed for the law, then for the church; but, as "he did not apply himself to the pursuit of academical honours," he left Oxford and visited Dublin, where he distinguished himself in private theatricals and achieved his earliest successes as a ballad-writer. In 1826 he married an Irish lady and very soon after, while staying at Lord Ashton's villa called Chessel, on the Southampton river, he wrote and composed his well-known song "I'd be a butterfly," which quickly obtained universal popularity. He wrote the words of the ballad, which was inspired by a butterfly which flitted before him, in a summer-house overlooking the water, and composed the melody the same evening. Bayly wrote much for the stage (nearly forty dramatic pieces) and some novels which are now forgotten. He also wrote an immense number of ballads and songs, some of which he set to music. In addition to "I'd be a butterfly," the most familiar are "Gaily the troubadour," "The soldier's tear," "We met—'twas in a crowd," "Oh, no, we never mention her," "Why don't the men propose, mamma?" and "She wore a wreath of roses," the last-named set by J. P. Knight. Bayly, who had experienced a serious reverse of fortune, died at Cheltenham, April 22, 1839, aged forty-one years. It has been said of him that "he possessed a playful fancy, a practised ear, a refined taste, and a sentiment which ranged pleasantly from the fanciful to the pathetic, without, however, strictly attaining either the highly imaginative or the deeply passionate." The memory of Haynes Bayly will long be preserved by his well-known line: "Absence makes the heart grow fonder."

The authorities of the Paris Conservatoire have lately made a valuable acquisition by the purchase of the original score of the comic opera "L'Arbre enchanté," by Gluck. The work is one of a series of similar ones written by the composer for the Court of Maria Theresa. It is a musical setting of a vaudeville by Vadé, and was produced in Vienna in 1762. Subsequently, when Gluck had come to reside permanently in the French capital, several performances of the little work also took place at the Royal Theatre in Versailles. It was again revived with success nearly a hundred years later at the Fantaisies Parisiennes, in Paris. In this connection it is pleasant to note the esteem in which Jean Jacques Rousseau, in his capacity of composer, was held by Gluck, as appears from the little-known dedication to Queen Marie Antoinette, of the original French edition of "Orphée," recently alluded to by M. Tiersot, in Le Ménestrel. In it the great operatic reformer, referring to the vaudeville "Le Devin du Village," says, inter alia: "I have noticed with satisfaction that in the music the natural accent of the language has been throughout preserved, M. Rousseau having applied this maxim to the simple style with the greatest success. His 'Devin du Village' is a model which as yet has found no imitators. Nor do I myself know to what extent I may have succeeded in following his example in the present work."

The recurrence of the Birmingham Festival provides a favourable opportunity for a peep behind the scenes of one or two of the earlier meetings, as revealed in some old account and minute books which came across our vision a few years ago at Birmingham. Here are a few items of expenditure at the festival of 1811:—

Paid 21 serjeants of 2nd Battilion (sic) of local Militia 5s. per day each for 3 days	15	15	0
1 pint of ale to each man, morning and night, and the same quantity to the Dragoons at the Barracks	5	10	0
2 gallons Seal oil	0	8	0
Mixed liquor..	0	2	6
½-pint spirit turpentine and bottle	0	0	8

Amongst the liquor—mixed and unmixed—and the "seal oil" expenses we light upon "Lampman for lighting, £1 16s. 0d." In 1814 "refreshments" are even more in evidence, as the following details will show—the qualifying title to the initial item being, we presume, an abbreviation of "black":—

B. Porter ..	0	1	0	2 Sandwiches ..	1	0
8 Suppers ..	0	16	0	Neguss	1	0
Ale	0	4	6	9 Eating	9	0
Gin	0	2	0	Capuliar	1	0
168 teas	8	8	0	Supper and ale ..	2	4
Bread and cheese	0	2	0	½-pint of Turpentine	0	9
Lemonade ..	0	2	0	9 lbs. Amer Biscuit	9	0
Brandy	0	1	0

To the credit side of this account, which is rather suggestive of liquidation, there appears—

Deduct for 13 lbs. of remains at 1s. 6d. .. 19s. 6d.

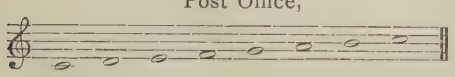
It seems evident from this that the remains were solids. The minute book of 1840, recording the preparations for the Festival of that year, contains the following resolution, duly moved, seconded, and carried:—

That the expenses under the head of Mendelssohn [!], Neukomm, Munden, and Regondi be reduced.

In 1837 (at which Festival Mendelssohn first appeared), and repeated in 1840, there is a curious resolution which shows commendable forethought on the part of the committee for those ladies in the gallery who were likely to faint:—

That Mr. Whateley be requested to provide Water and Salts for the gallery.

When will an exhaustive history of the Birmingham Musical Festival be written? There should be ample material for a most interesting and valuable book.



A correspondent calls our attention to the fact that, like Samuel Wesley (vide p. 601 of our last number), the late Sir Frederick Ouseley was also prematurely despatched by one of his biographers. In "The Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography," published in 1877, the notice of Ouseley, written by no less an authority than Dr. Rimbault, ends with these words: "He died in 1866." But this sad event did not occur till twenty-three years later! The same "Dictionary" gives some novel information in regard to Martini ("the German"), who is therein stated to have been "one of the first writers who, instead of the single line of figured brass which was formerly placed under songs, introduced a separate pianoforte accompaniment."

Herr Emmerich Kastner publishes in the Weekblad voor Muziek, of Amsterdam, some characteristic letters and notes written at different times by Franz Liszt. The following lines, dated June 6, 1849, addressed to a friend concerning Richard Wagner, who at the time was a fugitive from Dresden after the revolutionary outbreak in that capital, will be read with interest both in the light of subsequent events and as an instance of the writer's shrewd good sense. "Wagner," the Weimar pianist-conductor writes, "will by this time have happily arrived in Paris, whence he will furnish you with some big news about himself in the shape of a great new work which, I hope, he will succeed without too much difficulty in getting performed there in the course of the winter. His music is worth more, a thousand times, than his politics, and once the full tide of success to which he is entitled has come to him, I am convinced that he will no longer go astray on questions of Verfassung and rioting, which really are no business of his."

The Post Office has been tried—if not in the balances, in the scales—and has not been found wanting. We recently despatched a post card from an East-coast watering-place addressed as follows:

"Miss W——,

Cumberland."

Notwithstanding the absence of any time-signature the communication reached the addressee (at Sea-scale) with commendable promptitude. Who will say that the knowledge of music is not advancing in this country, even amongst men of letters?

Supplementary to the obituary notice of Mrs. Charles Lockey, given in another column, we record the following curious incident, which has been kindly communicated to us by her son, Mr. John Lockey. A deputation of gentlemen from the "Gentlemen's Concerts" at Manchester came to London to engage the principal artists for the season. They called upon Mrs. Lockey (then Miss Martha Williams) and enquired her terms. She named twenty-five guineas for each concert. They replied: "Oh! we don't know anything about guineas in Manchester. We are mostly men of business there, and guineas have gone out long ago! Call it thirty pounds and book it." She did.

The syllabusses (A and B) of the examinations conducted by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music have now been issued. We are glad to notice a very welcome change in regard to the test pieces in the Local Centre Examinations. Hitherto there has been only one list of six selected pianoforte pieces which the candidate has to perform; but now there are three lists to select from. This is a step in the right direction which will be much appreciated by teachers.

We have received a long letter from Mr. D. Davies, conductor of the Merthyr Choral Society, on the subject of the now famous Newport adjudication and the remarks of Mr. Joseph Bennett in support thereof. No good would arise from the publication of the letter. The incident has passed; enough has been said both pro and con, and we dismiss the matter by expressing a hope that adjudicators will continue fearlessly to do their duty and that conductors will, when a verdict is given against them, refrain from public protest. It may be added that Mr. Davies forwarded his letter to a local daily paper which has given a summary of its contents. This alone would be a sufficient reason for refusing admission to our columns.

The sister of the great violinist Bazzini has presented to the Philharmonic Society of Brescia, of which town he was a native, a number of valuable autographs from his pen. Amongst these are the score of his only opera, "Turanda" (produced at La Scala), that of the symphonic poem entitled "Francesca da Rimini," the symphony-cantata, the string quartet, frequently performed in Germany, and many others, all of them written in a remarkably neat and clear hand. Bazzini's favourite violin, we may add, a superb Guarnerius del Gesù, has recently been acquired by a Leipzig dealer for the sum of eighteen thousand francs.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

From my large experience as a Festival-goer I am able to say with some confidence that the apparition of the metropolitan musical critic in the provinces has a peculiarly irritating effect upon his local brother. Again and again have I read that the Londoner is, in point of fact, a very offensive person. He condescends; he is "erudite" (this ironically); he swaggers; he plays the superior person in more subtle ways than swaggering, and so on. As far as I know, all these bad qualities and practices exist only in the imagination of the provincial journalist. The metropolitan critics are, generally speaking, a harmless body of men, whose one desire is to get their work done decently, tread upon nobody's toes in the doing of it, and go home again. Their modesty is a marvel considering the knowledge they have that but for the presence of the metropolitan press at festivals those meetings would have no more than local importance, and pass for ever from the ken of the nation at large.

In connection with the recent Hereford Festival a provincial journal (for which I have the highest respect) indulged in its jealousy of the London critics by saying that, faute de mieux, those persons exercised their sportive wit upon the singing of a robin which had found its way into the Cathedral. So we did, some of us, and were very grateful to the little warbler for an incident which gave ten lines or so of "copy." Having made this frank confession, I may add that my provincial brother immediately preceded his attack by a paragraph in which seventeen lines were devoted to the same robin.

Hereford Festival was much over-policed; not by the good-natured and efficient constables of the city, but by the authorities of the Cathedral and others in office. I have commented elsewhere upon the offensive injunction—displayed in placards and printed on tickets—to remember that due respect should be paid to the house of God. What are we taken for? Are we "savages and men of Ind?" And what did the clergy suppose we were likely to do after centuries of their own teaching? Did they think we should break into applause, insist on encores, and consume oranges and ginger beer? Fie upon it.

At Hereford the authorities do not seem to be aware that critics, after hearing a new work, have to go away and put their opinions into shape, and that it is desirable for someone to watch on their behalf the performance of whatever may follow. Consequently the press tickets were marked "Not transferable." I have often ignored that regulation without demur on the part of those who made it. But not at Hereford. There the law is enforced to the bitter end.

At Hereford visitors are liable to be harried. On one occasion I entered the Cathedral between the close of the prayers and the opening of the performance, and was proceeding decorously to my place when a gentleman in clerical garb (I am told he was the secretary) hurried up and said, in petulant fashion, "Will you take your seat? Will you take your seat? They are waiting to begin!" I answered nothing. You may not brawl in church.

The Times remarks that, in his new "Magnificat," Dr. Parry treats a certain theme with "a grandeur of conception, a certainty and power, which were entirely beyond Mendelssohn's reach." The statement as to Mendelssohn's limitations reflects only on the writer, and does not signify. It is much more important that Dr. Parry stands in need of salvation from some of his friends.

The story goes that when Ysaye was in Salt Lake City he heard a Miss Hawley sing, and advised her to study for light opera. I quote the sequel: "Miss Hawley paid no further heed to the virtuoso's advice. Indeed, she married a wealthy mining operator, Colonel Howard Cromwell Woodrow. She has now secured the usual separation a mensâ et thoro, and proposes as a natural sequence to astonish the world in light opera. And to think that there are still those who claim that romance is dead!" No, romance is not dead; only the conditions of its birth have changed. It now springs fully grown from the brains of paragraphists.

Writing in the Pianist and Organist, Mr. Hamilton C. MacDougall warns English organists that their American brethren now regard Paris as the capital of the organ playing world, vice London, superseded. This change he attributes to the presence and influence in the States of Mr. Guilmant. Mr. MacDougall continues: "There are (can anyone deny it?) as talented men, as able performers, as great organists in London as in Paris. It therefore behoves the English organ school to send over its most brilliant representative for a tour in these United States if it wishes to retain at all the attention of the organ playing contingent. Does anyone doubt that not only fame but dollars have been the results alike for Guilmant et Cie and the publishers of French organ music as well? Our English cousins might just as well as not share in Johnny Crapaud's good fortune. Send over your best organist." Now, gentlemen, choose your man.

An American paper has an article headed "The Wagner Ring in London." Of course the writer did not mean it.

Mr. Finck, who has written a Life of Wagner, is reported as saying: "I confess that, after being a musical critic for sixteen years, I am deathly tired of concerts, operas, and recitals of all descriptions. I long more and more for expression. . . . I long to go among savages, and hear them sing their thrilling war songs, or listen to their impassioned drum solos." Is this the end?

The expected has happened—for a wonder—and the New York Symphony Society, in view of the continued putting-on of the dinner hour, has resolved to give all its concerts in the afternoon. A like step is looked for in the case of the Oratorio Society.

Following the example of certain English musicians, some American reformers (?) are now discussing the propriety of omitting the repeats in symphonies and sonatas. The advocates of this change quote Dr. Parry's "Evolution of the Art of Music," especially the following sentence: "In modern times the repetition of the first half (of a movement in sonata form) is also commonly dispensed with, because the musical instinct has become so quick to grasp any indication of design that it no longer requires to have such things insisted on, and because the progress of music towards a more passionately emotional phase makes it noticeably anomalous to go through the same exciting crises twice over." Apropos, I should like to ask: (I.) Is the repeat of the first half commonly omitted? (II.) Does the first half exhibit design? and is it not rather a display of thematic material? (III.) Has not the repeat of the first half been retained for the purpose of impressing the themes upon the mind? As to the anomaly pointed out by Dr. Parry in the last clause of his sentence, I can only express my regret that the art of music is being shaped by the laws of the passionately emotional—if any such exist.

I have a post card from Bergamo showing the Donizetti monument, the form and character of which might certainly, as report goes, have been suggested by Alma Tadema. It represents the composer, pen and manuscript in hand, seated on a marble bench listening to the Muse, who, standing by his side, strikes her harp and uplifts her voice. It is interesting to note the presence at the fêtes of "classical" artists like Joachim, Piatti, and Fanny Davies, to say nothing of Teresina Tua, Buonamici, Miss Alva, and Madame Melba. The great Italian master of song is worthily honoured.

Madame Fanny Moody and Mr. Charles Manners will soon issue the prospectus of their second opera competition, which is designed on a larger scale than its predecessor. A prize of £100, with a royalty of five per cent. on the net receipts of performance, will be offered for the best opera composed by a British subject, and a similar prize for a like work open to the world.

The Rev. Mr. Hamer and his wife entertained many of the Hereford chorus on Festival Thursday in the grounds of Belmont.

Consequent upon a subscription, limited to a shilling per head, raised by the Hereford Festival band and chorus, a presentation was made to Miss Anna Williams on the 16th ult. I am glad of it, and sincerely trust music-lovers generally will take steps, after the Birmingham Festival, effectively to recognise the services of an artist than whom nobody has shown higher ability and greater devotion.

The Services (Te Deum and Benedictus) sung in Hereford Cathedral by members of the Three Choirs during Festival week were Garrett in E, Sinclair in F, Hopkins in F, and Gibbons in F. The anthems were "Blessed be the God and Father" (S. S. Wesley), "Bow Thine ear" (Byrd), "While the earth" (C. L. Williams), and "If we believe" (Goss).

CHURCH MUSIC.

Recent events in connection with ecclesiastical solemnities seem to give point to the assertion that plain song is regaining in the Church something of its old position. To no small extent this revival is a matter of connection and association, or both. The strong wave of feeling in favour of a more carefully ordered ritual, including as it does appropriateness of surroundings, has been a large factor in this growth. The presence of figures of plain chant in music of all ages has been more or less marked, and is now distinctly noticeable; especially initial figures of melodies which seem to have been handed down from the ancient intonations of the modes, and permeated musical thought at all periods to no small extent. Then on all sides the revival of gothic architecture, antique furniture, and many other things of the days of old, is a distinct indication of the recognition of the "strange beauty of quaintness."

There is in this feeling a subtle human meaning which especially attaches itself to ancient ritual and old Church music. This influence is a communion, so to speak, with the spirit of things as known ages ago to our forefathers. No such feeling connects itself with any revival of Greek art; it is a form of thought related to the religious feeling of the Christian era, deepened by the veneration which age commands; and plain song has no stronger claim upon our emotions than lies in the fact that its, to us, quaint inflections were the sounds with which the early Church uplifted the voice of worship.

Much good work has been done by the Church Orchestral Society, a body which deserves far more practical support than has so far been accorded, in view of its maintenance and the enlargement of its operations. The society has undoubtedly two initial difficulties. These are found in the fact that the great Church festivals are everywhere celebrated on the same dates, and the want of adaptability of so many churches from the structural point of view. But these difficulties will be conquered by the authorities who have so far governed the society with marked skill and tact. One can well imagine the first of the two stated points being met by orchestral services being instituted during the octave of any given Church festival on week-day evenings, though the holiday craze may stand in the way of success in this direction. However, a more solid and lastingly useful remedy would be the training of the musically gifted young members of the various church institutions by the skilled performers of the society's orchestra, under the direction of the committee. To meet the second difficulty, the committee might well select a list of works suitable for small combinations of instruments and organ, and for churches of limited size and inadequate accommodation.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Readers will recollect a few words anent the powerful and interesting organ at the beautiful Parish Church of Warwick, built by the Hope-Jones Company, which, among other features, has a successful application of Mr. Hope-Jones' useful invention, the double touch. It may not be universally known that the idea of conferring something approaching tone elasticity by means of touch has exercised various ingenious minds. One curious patent, dated August, 1881, entered under the names Schmoele and Mols, deals with what is termed "a keyboard of accentuation." Without going into anything like an attempted explanation, it may be stated that, starting with the common basis of a separate wind chest for each manual, all the wind chests are connected with the "keyboard of accentuation," each key of which is fitted with contact makers consisting of springs of various lengths. By different degrees of pressure the pipes of the various registers which may be drawn are severally and collectively made to speak; and this method is applicable to single notes as well as to the performance of notes in combination or chords. This plan may have as many different touches as the depth under each key will permit. Such a threefold touch would require most careful manipulation on the part of the player. The painstaking thought now being devoted to organ mechanisms will, in due course, doubtless secure a greatly increased elasticity of tone from the application of the player's touch.

Another development, which will prove of great service, is the extension of couplers, so practicable in the electric and tubular pneumatic actions. Many organists of high reputation have pleaded against the multiplication of couplers as leading to a tendency to play too often with mixed combinations, formed by coupling different manuals. But there are good reasons on the other side: the tendency to employ broad piano effects only to be secured by coupling different manuals, effects so often used in modern French organ music and a parallelism with the frequently mixed rich broad orchestral harmonies of our modern scores; the advantage of transferring for occasional use the crescendo of the swell to other manuals by means of couplers; and the rendering of solo passages in octaves by means of sub or super-octave couplers, an effect suggested probably by the melodies in octaves constantly presented in the orchestral works of our day.

It is true the beauty of single stops and the fine tone of the characteristically independent manuals are precious exponents of organ-tone, exactly as the different families of the orchestra are effectively heard separately. All the same, whilst carefully studying the perfectly smooth and tuneful sounds of single stops and the dignified independence of the tones of distinct manuals, the organist of the future will be called upon to know how to handle in subtle combinations and in harmonious action all the varied effects under his charge.

Messrs. Norman and Beard have recently completed for the Pollokshields Free Church an organ with three manuals and a well thought-out specification.

The imposing four-manual instrument in Halifax Parish Church, originally the work of Snetzler, is being re-built by Messrs. Abbot and Smith, of Leeds.

A novel and poetical idea comes from Montreal—an attempt to induce listeners to attend such a summer-eve performance as "A Twilight Recital." The programme of this, played at the St. James's Methodist Church, contained two pieces not much known here—Vespers by Sudds and a Scherzo by Jadassohn.

Mr. G. T. Patman played a good programme at All Saints', Scarboro', on the 7th ult., including Smart's well known Andante and Finale and a movement from Widor's Seventh Organ Symphony. Mr. R. E. Parker's scheme for a recital on the 5th ult., at Wilmslow Parish Church, contained the Allegro Maestoso from Mr. J. E. West's admirable Sonata in D minor and "In Paradisum" by Dubois.

A very successful series of Recitals has just been concluded at St. John's Church, Boscombe, given by Messrs. George, Hume, H. Holloway, and R. Sharpe.

FESTIVAL OF THE THREE CHOIRS.

(From our special Correspondent.)

Time is loading this festival with all that makes for venerableness. There have been 174 meetings, the first of which seems, to one who looks at the calendar of events, as though it belonged to remote antiquity. There were living men in 1723 who might have seen King Charles beheaded, or, for that matter, taken part in the fight at Edge Hill and Marston Moor. Talk of a link with the past; surely this festival is one. It comes down through well-nigh two centuries, contemporary with all the events which have chiefly made our modern England. Is it wonderful that the three counties are proud of their music-meeting, its age, and its record?

The 174th festival was held at Hereford, beginning on Sunday, the 12th ult., and closing on Friday, the 17th ult. A new departure has to be noticed at the outset, the more imperatively because it involved a change greatly for the better. It had theretofore been the Hereford custom to "inaugurate" the meeting on Tuesday morning by a service and sermon, members of the three Cathedral choirs taking part. This was a survival from the very beginning; indeed, service and sermon once constituted the festival, if so it could then be called. The old function, brought religiously down to our day, has long seemed ineffective, and, in its limitations, inappropriate. Sooner or later, therefore, a change became inevitable, and Worcester first made it by holding a special service on Sunday morning; the music being supplied by the band and chorus, with some of the principal vocalists engaged at the festival. Hereford has now followed suit, and Gloucester, it is confidently expected, will do the same next year. The opening service, on the 12th ult., had particular musical interest conferred upon it by the production of a Te Deum and Benedictus specially composed by Mr. Edward Elgar. These works are adapted, by treatment and character, to exercise the minds of all who value the musical traditions of the English Church. Mr. Elgar, however, had not in view the requirements of ordinary service music. He wrote for festival use, scoring for full orchestra, and giving himself greater latitude in style and effect than would, perhaps, be appropriate in compositions designed to rank with the regular "services" of the Anglican repertory. It is beside the mark, therefore, to make comparisons, and all the critic has to do is to judge the new settings in the light of the composer's intentions. I spoke of them on the day of performance as "masterpieces of their kind," and such they seem to me now after full examination. The music and words possess only one spirit between them, and in every part their combined utterance is true in character, commanding in force. One best describes Mr. Elgar's work as showing the strong grasp of a man who is equal to his theme. He easily expresses in terms of music all the qualities of the verbal text. The composer employs recurring themes; being, to my mind, specially fortunate in his two main subjects, one of which is connected with the idea of praise; the other with that of prayer. The Benedictus has a beautiful independent opening, and concludes with matter already heard in the Te Deum, the whole being thus effectively rounded off. For festival purposes, and with an orchestra, these pieces are distinctly valuable. The performance, while not immaculate, was more than creditable. Other selections in the special service were Schubert's Symphony in B minor; a number, "How lovely is Thy dwelling-place," of Brahms's "German" Requiem; Elgar's "Imperial" March, and Beethoven's "Hallelujah," from the "Mount of Olives."

The series of performances began on Tuesday morning with a programme designed to celebrate the Royal Jubilee. Perhaps the public had wearied of such functions, but it is a fact anyhow that the attendance was only eleven in excess of the smallest during the week. With the reason of this I do not specially concern myself, and pass on to the works presented. These comprised the National Anthem (solo by Miss Anna Williams), Handel's "Zadok the Priest," Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, Saint-Saëns's "The Heavens declare," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and a "Hymn of Thanksgiving for the Queen's long Reign," the words selected and the music composed for the festival by Dr. Charles Harford Lloyd. It is not necessary to dwell upon the familiar works in this list. They could hardly go amiss in the tried and experienced hands of such artists as Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Daniel Price, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Plunket Greene; Mr. Sinclair conducting with customary decision and success. For the words of his "Hymn of Thanksgiving," Dr. Lloyd laid Hymnal, Prayer Book, and the Psalms under contribution, with an effect which, though patchy, cannot be charged with suffering from lack of textual appropriateness. There are five numbers in the work. First, a fugal chorus on the opening stanza of Tate and Brady's "Through all the changing scenes of life"; second, a soprano solo, "Behold, O God, our defender"; third, a tenor solo and chorus, being a setting of the versicles and responses beginning "O Lord, show Thy mercy upon us"; fourth, a duet for soprano and tenor, "O sing unto the Lord"; fifth, a fugal chorus, "The merciful and gracious God." Refusing the course taken by Mr. Elgar, Dr. Lloyd has kept closely to the orthodox Church style, save where, in the duet, he allows himself somewhat more latitude of expression. The fugal choruses resemble each other in structure pretty closely, and are written with obvious mastery of the form employed. Many worshippers of modernity have no doubt asked why the composer wrote a fugue at all. Choral fugues, nevertheless, are far from played out. They are a resource of which composers will go on availing themselves. At the same time, discretion should be used with regard to the words. The most satisfactory choral fugues, to my mind, are those in which only a brief text is employed, so that the entire verbal sense remains constantly before the mind. With a lengthy sentence the exigencies of the contrapuntal method disperse, so to speak, the meaning of the text. Dr. Lloyd seems to have perceived this, and made what are practically two fugues on the Tate and Brady stanza; starting a new subject at the third line. This left the verbal sense of the first fugue incomplete: "Through all the changing scenes of life, In trouble and in joy," being preposition clauses which have a definite signification only when joined to the remaining lines. The hymn-tune "Bedford" enters into the structure of both choruses. The themes are more or less derived from it, and in each the primitive form of the tune is used as a chorale. This is quite in the manner of Bach and the early contrapuntal masters, and, save as regards the dispersed sense of the verbal text, no objection can be raised against the effect. Dr. Lloyd uses his contrapuntal means with the ease and certainty of an accomplished technical musician. The solo numbers are, on the whole, very successful. So must be considered, at any rate, the beautiful tenor solos and chorus, and the animated, well-written duet for soprano and tenor. In a work of this class, composed with a feeling that the occasion for it had passed, it must be hard to keep the music at once elevated and interesting. Dr. Lloyd has not at every point overcome this difficulty. His flight is at moments depressed; but, taking the work for all in all, it constitutes a notable example of present-day Church composition, and is a fitting musical memorial of a great event. The composer conducted an efficient performance, in which, as may be supposed, Madame Albani and Mr. Lloyd did service which, for excellence, could not be surpassed.

Tuesday evening was occupied with a miscellaneous concert in the small and inconvenient Shire Hall. Only familiar selections figured in the programme, among the more conspicuous being the Overture to "Die Zauberflöte," Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor (solo played by Mr. Oscar Meyer), and a group of Wagner pieces, including the "Flying Dutchman" overture, the Vorspiel and Liebestod of "Tristan," and the Prelude to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." It is unnecessary to dwell upon such well-known works and their performance, simply because a London band played them at Hereford. To the audience, it may be presumed, they were less like an oft-told tale than to Londoners who hear everything frequently. These festivals, indeed, have their chief musical use in partially making up to a rural population for the inevitable disadvantages of their position, and only with due regard to that point can the programmes be rightly judged. Madame Albani, Miss Marie Brema, and Mr. Plunket Greene were the vocalists.

Wednesday morning brought heavy work for the capital chorus, all the members of which, save about forty, had been gathered by Mr. Sinclair from the associated counties. The programme opened with Bach's cantata "A Stronghold sure," continued with a new Magnificat (Latin text) by Dr. Hubert Parry and a selection from "Parsifal," and ended with Spohr's "Last Judgment." Here was surely enough, as well for audience as performers, and it may be questioned whether many sat it out, despite the great favour in which the "Last Judgment" is held. Bach's cantata made no very lively impression. During some of the numbers the bearing of the audience suggested that they were more puzzled than pleased, and no wonder! for a good deal of Bach's vocal music requires a special training if there is to be appreciation. The public were on firm ground, of course, when "Ein' feste Burg," the chorale upon which the work is founded, was running its majestic course, but where they were during some other parts I should not like to say. The chief points in the performance included a very fine rendering, by Mr. Plunket Greene, of the recitative and air, "Consider then, child of God." Mr. Greene may further be complimented upon his execution of the remarkable passages which run briskly about the chorale tune in the duet, "Our utmost might is all in vain." He was associated on this occasion with Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Miss Jessie King. The "Parsifal" selection, in which Mr. Chandos and Mr. Greene took part, comprised the Good Friday music (orchestral only) and the Finale to the first act. Much pains had been taken in preparing these examples, and the performance thoroughly deserved the appreciation which seemed to attend it. Concerning Dr. Parry's Magnificat I shall, on this occasion, speak briefly, since the work is one which, while it strikes the hearer with an immediate sense of beauty and power, leaves him conscious that much remains to be revealed by fuller acquaintance. Only a single opinion found expression among the musicians who heard the Magnificat—an opinion that here was a composition which, though it might hurry some into extravagance of laudation, closed entirely the mouth of the caviller. For once, the entire press, as far as I saw, was in accord, giving substantially the same verdict; and we must all admit that when the press does agree its unanimity is wonderful. Dr. Parry employs but one soloist, a soprano (Miss Anna Williams), for whom he provided two remarkable airs, besides incidental passages. The text of the airs suggested vigorous handling, and the composer met the requirements with music of an antique cast, which brought to mind the rugged strength of Purcell's melody and the special character, also ruggedly strong, of "Art thou greater than our Father Jacob?" in Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria." The second air is perhaps the more remarkable of the two, in right of features which approach as near to originality as can now be expected. But it is in the choral numbers that the composer's power is most impressively displayed. The manner in which the old church intonation associated with the Magnificat is treated; the full, rich sonority secured throughout; the consummate directness with which effects are produced, and the general strength and solidity of the harmonic structure mark this work as deserving to rank among the greatest of recent achievements. Dr. Parry conducted, and afterwards declared his satisfaction with the performance. He had every right to be satisfied. The attendance, 1,337, was the smallest of the week.

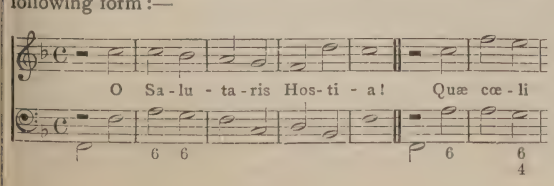
"Elijah" was given on Wednesday evening, and heard by 1,706 persons. This was the largest audience of the week. Nearly all the vocal artists engaged at the festival took part.

On Thursday morning the programme included Beethoven's Mass in D, Tschaïkowsky's Symphony ("Pathetic") in B minor, and the first part of Haydn's "Creation."

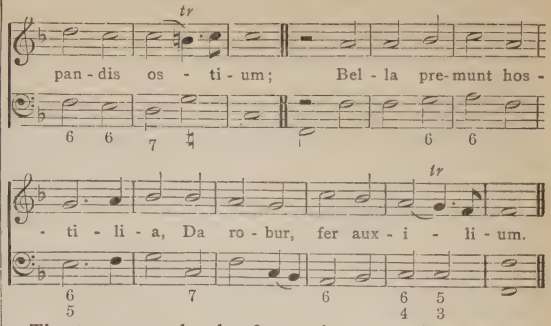
The attendance was one of the largest, the figures standing at 1,449. Waiving unnecessary discussion of works which times without number have been the theme of criticism, I pass on to attempt a just appreciation of the choral performance in Beethoven's Mass. Rarely has that difficult music been attacked with greater spirit or more signal success. Every performer was on his mettle, and, made confident by adequate preparation, discharged his task with positive enthusiasm. All honour to the Hereford chorus for an unquestionably great achievement. The orchestra was not so satisfactory, but the solo vocalists—Madame Albani, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills—fully met all demands.

On Thursday evening an audience of 1,435 listened to Gounod's "Redemption," and on Friday morning "The Messiah" drew its customary crowd of votaries, well ending a festival upon which the conductor, Mr. Sinclair, can look back with satisfaction and even with pride. In all respects, musically and financially, the meeting was up to the mark.

SAMUEL WEBBE.



Attention has recently been called to that eminent glee composer, Samuel Webbe, by the erection of a monument to his memory in Old St. Pancras Churchyard, where he is buried. Webbe, who was a Roman Catholic, was for many years organist of the chapel of the Sardinian Embassy. In this connection our contemporary the Tablet has discovered in the Laity's Directory for 1793 the following interesting announcement: "Sardinian Chapel—Mr. Webb (sic) gives instruction gratis every Friday evening at 7 o'clock to such young gentlemen as present themselves to learn the Church Music." In all the dictionaries Webbe is stated to have been born at Minorca, but there would seem to be some doubt upon this point. The Gentleman's Magazine of 1816 (the year of Webbe's death) contains a most interesting obituary notice of this worthy musician, which we quote in full:



"S. Webbe, Esq., by his general as well as professional erudition, the acuteness of his perception, the solidity of his judgment, the impressiveness of his language, his universal philanthropy, the simplicity of his heart, and the dignified amenity of his manners, excited the admiration and love of those who enjoyed the happiness of his acquaintance. He afforded one of the most extraordinary instances of a life well spent, in the genuine sense of the expression, that is not often presented to our knowledge. He was born in 1740, of parents of high respectability and independent fortune. His father was sent to Minorca, under some Government appointment, while he was yet an infant of scarcely a year old [this seems to infer that he was not born at Minorca]; and having settled his establishment there, had already written for his wife, with her infant child, to join him; which, however, before the preparation for their departure could be completed, were followed by letters announcing his death. Independent of the shock on his wife, this event was followed by unfair proceedings, and by the diversion of property from its rightful descent, on the part of those who had the power of controlling the disposal. His wife was thus reduced to a state of comparative penury, which proved disastrous to the future fortunes of his infant son. She could extend to him little advantage of education, but being intent upon rendering him capable of providing for himself, she bound him apprentice to a cabinet-maker at the early age of eleven years. This arrangement, however, was so little to his taste, that no sooner were the seven long years elapsed than he determined to abandon the workshop, and contemplated with infinite regret what he regarded as a total loss of a considerable and valuable portion of his early life. Within a year after this emancipation (for such he always considered it) he lost his mother, and with her the little means of support derived from her slender income. Thus destitute of any visible means of support, and still under twenty years of age, he turned his attention to the employment of copying musick, as connected with an art of which he was passionately fond, but with which as yet he was totally unacquainted; he obtained his principal employment from Mr. Welcher, keeper of a well-known old music-shop in Gerrard Street, Soho, through whom he became acquainted with a musician of the name of Barbandt, a professor of no particular skill, but from whom he rapidly acquired the rudiments of musick, which his own intense study and observation soon enlarged into a thorough knowledge of the art. At the expiration of his apprenticeship, he applied himself sedulously to the acquirement of Latin, and did not allow himself to be interrupted by the subsequent necessity of copying music for a subsistence, though when fully employed he would sit till past twelve at night and return to it by five in the morning for a week in succession. He followed the Latin by the study also of French, still appropriating every moment of intermission from those employments suggested by necessity, and excited by an anxious thirst for self-improvement, to the ardent study of musick, of which he had now determined to make himself completely master. His necessities were augmented at the age of twenty-three by the addition of a wife, and in the following year of a child; but as difficulties increased, so seemed also to increase his thirst of knowledge; and soon after the birth of his first child, he furnished himself with an Italian master.

"About this time he ventured to become a teacher of musick and his progress in the art fully warranted this undertaking, though he was then but twenty-five years of age, and it was but six years since his first acquaintance with the rudiments of musick. From this period, scarcely a single year passed without producing the reward of one and often two prize-medals, down to the time when the club desisted from affording such liberal encouragement to that most delightful and social description of vocal musick, glees. His literary studies were subsequently enlarged by the successive acquisition of the German, Greek, and lastly the Hebrew language; in the reading and understanding of which last (Hebrew) he was acknowledged, ten years ago, by his master, a venerable and skilful Rabbi, who visited him in that capacity, to be equal to himself. Although it may seem of minor importance to speak, in the midst of a commentary upon the varied faculties and acquirements of his mind, of his bodily graces, it is in point to shew that in the vast range of objects which his ardent industry embraced, these coadjutors were not neglected, and, in truth, he long excelled in the manly and graceful exercises of fencing and dancing. But superior to all these faculties of mind and these graces of body were the indescribable excellencies, the simplicity, the tenderness, the thorough goodness of his heart. His works are extremely numerous, as well as infinitely varied—having written largely for the Church; his anthems are in use in almost every Cathedral in the Country; he composed also two or three Operas, many quartets and instrumental lessons, numerous songs, some of them highly distinguished as public favourites, as 'The Mansion of Peace,' &c.; and glees innumerable, and so well known as to require no formal eulogium. As an English composer, he will always rank with Lock, Morley, Purcell, and Arne; while as a man and a scholar, his transcendent qualities raise him high among the most renowned of British Worthies."

Webbe's familiar long metre tune "Melcombe" first appeared in "A collection of Motetts and Antiphons | for 1, 2, and 3 voices | For chorus | calculated for the more solemn parts | of | Divine worship | by | S. Webbe." The preface is dated "Aug. 1792" and the tune appears in the following form:—

The tune very shortly afterwards appeared for the first time as "Melcombe" in Part II. of Harrison's "Sacred Harmony," where it is designated "Melcombe L.M. ♯," and is set, in four parts, to the words "O render thanks to God above."

THE COMING SEASON.

The winter season of 1897-8, now about to commence, promises to be exceptionally busy, as it also promises to be of exceptional interest, and voracious indeed must be the appetite of the musical amateur whose cravings are not satisfied with the feast of good things set before him, if indeed he do not find it an embarras de choix. Dealing first with our leading metropolitan choral body, the Royal Choral Society, so ably directed by Professor Sir Frederick Bridge, we are promised at the

a series of eight subscription concerts with an extra performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday, the annual performance of the same work on New Year's Day being, by desire of many subscribers, included in the series. The concerts will commence on November 11 with "Elijah," the cast including Madame Albani, Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The other announcements are Berlioz' "Faust," December 9; the "Creation," January 1; "The Redemption," on Ash Wednesday; Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (for which a new English version has been prepared by Mr. Paul England) and a new cantata by Franco Leoni, "The Gate of Life," on March 16; the final concert, on May 5, including "The Golden Legend" and the conductor's Jubilee cantata "The Flag of England," repeated by desire. The chief artists engaged, in addition to those already named, are Miss Ella Russell, Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Clara Butt, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Philip Brozel, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Andrew Black, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Miss Anna Williams's "farewell" concert will take place on the 13th inst., when she will be assisted by a number of eminent artists who have been her colleagues on many occasions. At the

in addition to the Promenade Concerts, which will terminate on the 16th inst., the enterprising manager, Mr. Robert Newman, announces three series of concerts, conducted by M. Lamoureux; so that instead of having, as last season, a week's performances under the great French conductor, there will be—first, four concerts, on November 3, 10, 24, and December 1; a second set of four concerts, on February 2, 16, March 2 and 15; and, finally, two concerts, on April 20 and May 4. M. Lamoureux will not bring over a French orchestra, but will conduct Mr. Newman's permanent orchestra, which will be augmented to 103 performers for these concerts. The programmes of the first four are of very great interest, but why should the titles of the works be announced in French? Mr. Henry J. Wood will conduct a series of Saturday Afternoon Symphony Concerts, on the 30th inst., November 6, 13, 20, 27; December 4; January 15, 22, 29; February 5, 12, 19, 26; and March 5, 12, and 19, which will necessitate the discontinuance of the Winter Saturday Night Promenade Concerts. The autumn season of the Philharmonic Society will consist of three concerts, on November 4, 18, and December 2, and special interest will be imparted by the presence of Herr Grieg, Herr Humperdinck, and Herr Richard Strauss, who will respectively conduct some of their own compositions. There will be three Richter Concerts, on Monday evenings, the 18th and 25th inst., and November 1, and six Wagner Concerts, under the conductorship of Herr Felix Mottl, Herr Hermann Levi, Herr Richard Strauss, and Herr Felix Weingartner, on Tuesday evenings, November 9, 16; December 7, April 26, May 17, and Thursday evening, June 16. The London Ballad Concerts will take place on Saturdays, 23rd inst., December 11, January 8, March 26; Wednesdays, November 10, 24, January 26, February 9, March 9, with the usual sacred concert on Ash Wednesday evening. The Sunday Afternoon Orchestral Concerts were resumed on Sunday afternoon, the 19th ult., with the permanent orchestra of ninety performers, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood, who will now also conduct the Queen's Hall Choral Society. The National Sunday League will resume its series of oratorio performances on Sunday evenings throughout the winter, and, indeed, right on to the summer of 1898. Mr. Willy Hess's Cologne Quartet will give a recital of chamber music in the Queen's (Small) Hall on December 2. It will be remembered that the last concert of this Quartet, in June, had to be postponed owing to the illness of one of the members.

St. James's Hall.

The Popular Concerts will be resumed on Monday, November 1, and Saturday, November 6. There will be the usual interregnum after Saturday, December 18, until Monday, January 3, and the concerts will then continue until April 4. The Ballad Concerts will be given on the afternoons of November 3, 10, 17, 24; January 26; February 2, 9, 16; March 2, 9, and a sacred concert on Ash Wednesday evening. Mr. Vert will give three morning concerts on the 16th, 23rd, and 30th inst. The artists who will appear at these concerts will be Madame Albani, Miss Ella Russell, Miss McIntyre, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Santley, Mr. Andrew Black, Signor Foli, Mr. George Grossmith, and others. Herr Busoni will give six afternoon pianoforte recitals commencing on November 4. Herr Georg Liebling will give two afternoon pianoforte recitals on November 8 and 15—the first concert will be orchestral. Mr. Ambrose Austin's annual Scotch ballad concert will take place as usual on St. Andrew's Day, November 30. In addition to the preceding events, recitals will be given by M. Jean and Mdlle. Ten Have, Herr Hyllested, Mdlle. Dubois, and notably by Edvard Grieg; also concerts by Mr. Charles Jacoby and Mdlle. Ella Pancera. On the 28th inst. and November 5 a concert-lecture on Greek music will be given by M. Bourgault-Ducoudray and M. Aramis, with illustrative remarks delivered by Mr. E. F. Jacques.

Crystal Palace.

The forty-second annual series of Saturday concerts will commence on the 9th inst., when Madame Blanche Marchesi will be the vocalist, and an infant pianist, Bruno Steindel (seven years of age) will make his first appearance in England. The concerts will continue until November 27, the artists announced being Miss Ella Russell, Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan, Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. John Child, and Mr. Santley (vocalists); Miss Maud McCarthy, M. Jean Ten Have, and M. Gregorowitsch (violinists); Herr Robert Hausmann (violoncellist), and Miss Fanny Davies, M. Gabrilowitsch, and Mr. Eugene d'Albert (pianists). Mr. Manns, needless to say, will conduct. On and after the 4th inst. the Crystal Palace orchestra will give both afternoon and evening concerts. On Thursday evenings the concerts will be vocal and instrumental, with occasional performances of popular oratorios at popular prices, under the direction of Mr. Manns; and on Saturday evenings there will be Promenade concerts by the Crystal Palace military band, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Godfrey.

Mr. Clifford Harrison's Recitals will be resumed to-morrow, the 2nd inst., at Steinway Hall; and Mr. Charles Fry's Recitals, with Miss Olive Kennett, have been postponed until the spring. The importance attached to music, in association with recitation, by these reciters causes their performances to be of interest to musical readers.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Mr. Robert Newman began his third series of promenade concerts at the Queen's Hall on August 28. As last year, the orchestra consists of ninety performers; but, in pursuance of his commendable object to form a permanent orchestra of the highest calibre, he has re-organised his band and elected twenty-seven new instrumentalists, many of whom are well-known players of their respective instruments. Mr. Henry J. Wood has made no less progress in the art of conducting than the improvement effected in his forces, and his readings of classic masterpieces and works of all schools have shown uncommon artistic intuition and rare ability to secure desired effects. The practice of devoting certain nights to particular composers has been wisely modified, works by other writers being included in the respective programmes, with increase of their attractiveness. As an educational medium the concerts have been no less so than in previous seasons; and as an indication of the healthy influence they are exerting may be quoted the plebiscite concert on the 21st ult., when the following selection was made: Overture to "Tannhäuser," Tschaïkowsky's Sixth Symphony, "Peer Gynt" Suite, "Ride of the Valkyries," and Fantasia on Gounod's "Faust." A commendable feature of the programmes has been the inclusion of works by English composers, and this list comprises Sullivan's "Di Ballo" Overture and "Graceful Dance" from his music to "Henry VIII.," Cowen's "Four Old English Dances" and the Suite de Ballet "In Fairyland," and the Masque from Edward German's incidental music to "As you Like It," written for Mr. Alexander's production of Shakespeare's play at the St. James's Theatre in December last. Several interesting novelties have also been heard.

On the 1st ult. the first performance in England was given of César Cui's "Suite-Miniature" (Op. 20). This consists of six movements, severally entitled "Petite Marche," "Impromptu à la Schumann," "Cantabile," "Souvenir Douloureux," "Berceuse," and "Scherzo Rustique." They possess few of the characteristics of Slavonic music, but are neatly written and are pleasing in nature.

On the 3rd ult. a Romance and Fandango, by Nàpravnik, were heard for the first time. These pieces are much more representative of the Russian school than the preceding by Cui, and justify Nàpravnik being placed amongst Russian composers, although by birth he is a Bohemian. The next novelty, presented on the 4th ult., was an entr'acte, entitled "Summer Dreams," by Mr. W. H. Squire. This was an unpretentious but extremely attractive piece, and met with a very hearty reception. Another new work by an Englishman, Mr. T. H. Frewin, was produced on the 10th ult. Mr. Frewin is a member of Mr. Newman's orchestra and has contributed to the programme on previous occasions. His latest production, however, is the most important and also the best of his compositions. It consists of seven "Sketches for Orchestra," which have for their basis the famous soliloquy in "As you Like It," the "Seven ages of man." The second and third numbers show a sense of humour which is happily expressed, but the best section is the last, in which the preceding themes are deftly introduced and effectively treated. Mr. E. F. Jacques still continues his instructive and interesting analytical remarks.

FRANCO LEONI'S "RIP VAN WINKLE."

Much interest pertained to Mr. E. C. Hedmondt's production, on the 4th ult., at Her Majesty's Theatre, of Messrs. William Akerman and Franco Leoni's romantic opera "Rip van Winkle." In sundry songs and especially in a cantata entitled "Sardanapalus" (produced at the Queen's Hall on March 7 last year, under the direction of Mr. Betjemann), Mr. Leoni had given testimony of possessing musical gifts from which good fruit might be expected. Before, however, considering the music of "Rip van Winkle" it will be well to glance at the libretto. This, in common with that of Planquette's comic opera of the same name, is founded upon Washington Irving's famous romance, but Mr. Akerman has changed Rip's wife from a scold as drawn by Irving into an affectionate spouse. This is an artistic mistake, whereby a valuable contrast is lost, much humour is banished, and sympathy with Rip is diminished. With this exception Mr. Akerman's book is commendable. It is no easy task to write an entire libretto in rhyme, to vary the metre for musical requirements, to avoid words difficult to vocalise, and, above all, to relate the story in a direct fashion imperative to successful dramatic diction. All this, however, the author may be said to have fairly accomplished, and the book is readable as well as singable, and contains some humorous lines—as, for instance, when Rip, seeking for his wife and suddenly confronted with his rapacious creditor, quietly remarks:—

MY LOVE DWELT IN A NORTHERN LAND.

I'm looking for a pleasant face—
Yours comes most oddly out of place.

Mr. Leoni is by birth an Italian, and although he has long lived in England and his music shows that he is well acquainted with the most successful works of modern composers of various nationalities, he has wisely let the spirit of the "sunny South" dominate his conception. We advisedly use the word "wisely," as composers speak most effectively when they do so in the musical idiom of their nationality. Mr. Leoni's music is consequently chiefly distinguished by melodious grace of that suave and flowing character which seems to be inspired by Italian skies. When need be, however, it is not lacking in dramatic force; and in this particular Mr. Leoni's work may not only be regarded as one of considerable accomplishment, but of decided promise. In the first act, which terminates with Rip's departure for the Katskill mountains in search of the hidden treasure, the most notable numbers are the spirited ditty of folk-song character sung by Rip as he makes his first entrance surrounded by delighted village children, and the duet in which Rip's wife pleads for his consideration of their daughter Alice. A pleasing duet between the somewhat obtrusive lovers, Knickerbocker and Katrina, provides effective contrast to the scene in which Rip's wife, Gretchen, tells her neighbours of her husband's determination to go up the Katskill mountains. The choral portion of this scene is skilfully written and shows dramatic perception and the power to express it simply and emphatically. Similar ability is displayed at the opening of the second act in the choruses of the villagers who have come in search of the mountaineering Rip. A love duet between Knickerbocker and Katrina might with advantage have been shorter, or omitted altogether, as it stops the directness of the dramatic action; but the music to the subsequent scenes between Rip and his wife, and Gretchen and Rip's enemy Derrick, is admirable, and intensifies the significance of the situations. The same may be said of the music which accompanies the supernatural appearances; the threatening ghosts, the antics of the dwarf with his keg of schnapps, and the seductive dance of the Spirit of the Mountain, to whose fascinations Rip ultimately succumbs. The strongest number of the work is heard from the orchestra as the curtain rises for the last act. The twenty years' sleep of Rip is supposed to have passed and he is seen in the same position in which he fell, but almost covered with leaves and broken twigs. No word is spoken by him as he slowly wakes and finally staggers once more down the path which leads to the village; but the music expresses all the wild grief and despair which subsequently comes to him when he learns of the death of his wife. Æsthetically this number would more appropriately be heard while the scene is being changed to the village where, infirm and tottering, Rip presently arrives; but presumably Mr. Leoni deemed the confusion and vacuous state of Rip's mind on his awakening to be impossible of effective musical illustration, and thus decided on an anticipatory method. Much taste and skill are shown in the pathetic situations of the last scene, and Alice's song, in which she recalls the recollections of her childhood, is one of the most artistic numbers in the score.

The orchestration shows a lively fancy and considerable knowledge of effective instrumental combinations, and, taken in its entirety, the music is of a nature which readily appeals to a wide circle of listeners, and that should add to its composer's reputation. The title rôle was excellently sustained by Mr. Hedmondt, who, both histrionically and vocally, gave forcible expression to the humour and pathos of the part. Mr. Homer Lind's embodiment of Derrick was also admirable, and there was much to praise in the assumptions of the old and young Vedder by Mr. Arthur Winckworth and of the poet Knickerbocker by Mr. Herbert Linwood. The characters of Gretchen and Katrina were capably played by Miss Attalie Clair and Miss Isa McCusker; and Miss Ada Davies, who appeared as Alice, sang her song in a manner that testified to a sympathetic temperament and good training. No little of the success of the second act was attributable to the graceful gestures and dancing of Miss Ross-Selwicke as the Spirit of the Mountain, and the picturesque suggestiveness of the scenery also deserves to be recorded.

"Rip Van Winkle" was performed until the 21st ult., when Humperdinck's fairy opera "Hänsel und Gretel" was revived and Mr. Leoni's work relegated to Monday and Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons. For "Hänsel und Gretel" Mr. Hedmondt had secured the services of Miss Marie Elba, Miss Edith Miller, and Madame Julia Lennox, who respectively sustained their original personations of Hänsel, the Witch, and Gertrude, as on the first production of the work in England by the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company at Daly's Theatre on Boxing-day of 1894. These embodiments have never been surpassed in excellence, and the new Gretel of Miss Margaret Ormerod was quite as good as any which have been seen, the music being admirably sung and the child-like exuberance and vivacity of the character being portrayed with remarkable completeness. Mr. William Paul was convincing as Peter, and the dainty songs of the Sandman and the Dewman were sympathetically sung by Miss Ada Davies. The orchestra was not so satisfactory, but the stage management was, on the whole, very good. Mr. Max Laistner was the conductor.

REVIEWS.

A Practical Treatise on Organ-building, with Plates and Appendices. By F. E. Robertson, C.I.E.
[Sampson Low.]

This well-printed book of 361 pages (exclusive of the plates, which are published separately) furnishes a comprehensive treatise on the construction of the organ. The author brings to his task the scientific qualifications of being a "Member of the Institution of Civil Engineers" as well as "President, Egyptian Railway Board"; and, "for the musical part," according to his preface, "an experience of twenty-five years in repairing and building [organs], with a keen interest in the subject." The raison d'être of the book is that it "will supply the information needed by the amateur builder, and enable those in charge of organs in foreign parts to keep them in order, while the special remarks as to organ construction for hot climates may be worthy the attention of builders, who little know what trials their work will have to undergo, even when built 'specially for hot climates.'" The chapters on "Acoustics, as relating to organs," "Scale of flue pipes," and "Scale of reeds" are very exhaustive, as might be expected from the scientific training of the author, while those on "Pipe-making," the various kinds of "Actions"—mechanical, pneumatic, and electric—and "Voicing and tuning" receive ample treatment. Judging from the specifications given in Chapter xii., the author would seem to have a preference for foreign and American built organs. As samples of Mr. Robertson's wise remarks we may quote the following: "One of the commonest faults in English organs is an utter disproportion between manual and pedal." "The plainest and best of all styles is to have the front pipes of burnished tin, which is as good as silver"; and, in regard to the important matter of the swell-box, he says it is on no account to be made too small; "it cannot be too large, it is hardly ever large enough." The author's Indian experiences enable him to tell the following story, though he mercifully withholds the name of the "leading firm" who supplied the instrument. "A friend, associated in organ-building with the writer, once bought for £13 a three-manual organ of no great age for a cathedral in one of the Presidency towns in India. This organ, built by a London firm who would consider themselves a leading firm, was condemned as useless.

The pipes were of pure lead, and so thin, that a c^0 pipe could be easily ripped right down by the fingers, and most of the feet had crumpled up." It is some satisfaction to know that these disastrous results were largely the fault of the purchaser, "who insisted upon more stops than the price would cover." If organ purchasers will do such idiotic things, they deserve all the consequences. The last chapter contains a useful bibliography of about 300 works on the organ, "dating from the seventeenth century to the present time." This is a somewhat smaller list than that supplied by Mr. Carl A. Thimm to "Notes and Queries" in 1890, but it will answer every purpose. Unfortunately most books on the organ are in the German language, having an intricate and dry style of diction.

We must not forget to mention that the plates of this "Practical Treatise" under review are published in a separate (folio) volume, and that they constitute not the least interesting feature of this valuable and thoughtful production. The absence of any historical matter and the strongly technical trend of the book will necessarily cause it to appeal rather more to the organ artificer than to the musician; but it may be safely recommended to those organists who take a practical interest in the mechanical part of their instruments, and especially to those who are beyond the reach of an organ-builder's immediate help.

Organ Arrangements. Nos. 42—46. Edited by George C. Martin.

The Village Organist. Books 7—9. Edited by J. Stainer and F. Cunningham Woods.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Five useful numbers of the "Organ Arrangements" are before us. Nos. 42 and 46 are the first two movements of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" Symphony, arranged by Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank. The first, while retaining the main features of the original score, is well laid out for the organ. The popular Allegretto, which makes a capital wedding voluntary, is also excellently arranged. Chopin's Prelude in G, No. 13 (No. 43 of this series) would furnish an attractive number at an organ recital; while the "Basso Ostinato" (which readers of The Musical Times need hardly be told is a "ground bass"), by Antoine Arensky, one of the young Russian school of composers, is of special interest. This movement (No. 44) is from "six pièces pour le piano," and is written in the uncommon rhythm of quintuple time. Both these numbers are arranged by Mr. Burnham W. Horner. No. 45 is Mr. Edward Elgar's famous "Imperial" March, admirably transcribed by the editor, Sir George Martin.

A further instalment of the "Village Organist" (Books 7, 8, and 9) testifies to the rapid growth of this useful publication. As in the previous issues, arrangements vie with original pieces in attractiveness, amongst the latter being favourable examples by such well-known composers as Mr. John E. West, Mr. Max Oesten, Dr. Harford Lloyd, Mr. Battison Haynes, Mr. J. F. Barnett, and Mr. A. R. Gaul.

Musical Memories. By A. M. Diehl.

[Richard Bentley and Son.]

Mrs. Diehl, who as Miss Alice Mangold was formerly well known as an excellent pianist, has in recent years distinguished herself as the writer of eight, if not more, novels. Hence the book before us possesses a certain literary flavour which is not always present in "reminiscences," &c., written by musicians. The pleasant memories here recorded begin at Paris "in the early sixties," when Mrs. Diehl called on Berlioz, who said to her: "You are musical; you come from London; you must know my great friend Davison. What a critic! what a man!" How very different was Wagner's opinion of Mr. Davison. When paying the return visit, Berlioz "condemned the practice of many consecutive hours at the piano, and of the use of nerve stimulants, such as tea and coffee. 'Surtout,' he insisted, 'point de café noir.'" The references to Henselt, Mrs. Diehl's master, are naturally very interesting, though we have a recollection of reading something of a similar kind in her "Elsie's Art Life." When Henselt was not in the teaching humour he would cry "'Falsch!' in various tones for the first half-hour, then kill flies silently, till he marched out and banged the door. Or, worst of all, he would bring in the dogs and play with them, and let the unhappy pupil do her uttermost without comment, even at the end." We cannot recall any other composer who was a fly-catcher! Mrs. Diehl devotes a whole chapter of thirty-one pages to the London musical critics, past and present, about all of whom she writes in most appreciative terms. We think that the first appearances in England of Rubinstein and Joachim are not quite correctly given. These two great artists certainly did not first appear together (p. 158). Rubinstein, as a boy of eleven, made his London début at the Hanover Square Rooms, on May 20, 1842; but that of Joachim, ætat thirteen, was at Mr. Bunn's benefit, Drury Lane Theatre, March 28, 1844. If Mrs. Diehl does not tell us anything particularly new, she writes very pleasantly, and her book will doubtless prove an interesting fireside companion to many a reader on a winter's evening.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 325—337.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Recent instalments of this popular series are No. 325, "Swiftly the moments of my life are flying," a Litany for use during Advent, music by J. Maude Crament. In this simple yet effective setting some of the verses are accompanied, some unaccompanied. The "Christ, have mercy," and "Let us therefore cast off" are in four-part harmony. No. 326 is a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G, by Arthur E. Godfrey. The music, of smooth, tuneful character, is in its way telling. No. 327 is a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A, by Sir J. Goss. The composer has here combined simplicity and dignity; the quiet Nunc dimittis is particularly expressive. No. 328 is a setting of Benedicite, omnia Opera in F, by Myles B. Foster, in free chant form, and the composer has displayed great skill in repeating one particular phrase with ever varying harmony; the music altogether is effective and likely to become popular. No. 329 is a simple Vesper Hymn, "Adapted from Beethoven," and harmonised in two ways by John E. West. In No. 330, the Offertory Sentences, by Sir J. Stainer, the unpretentious music is well in keeping with the words. Between the Sentences the interludes or voluntaries are left for the organist to fill in. No. 331, Benedictus qui venit and Agnus Dei, by the late Dr. Garrett, are two short, well-written serviceable movements. In No. 332 the same words are set, and in somewhat similar manner, by the same composer. No. 333-336 contain the Offertory Sentences, by J. T. Field. The settings are plain yet pleasing, though some numbers, as one would expect, are more attractive than others. No. 337 is a useful Benedictus, 4th series (Gregorian Tones), by Sir J. Stainer.

Three Introductory Voluntaries for the Organ. By J. Varley Roberts. [Weekes and Co.]

The three pieces by the organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, consist of a "Siciliano in F," a "soft diapason movement in F," and an "Andante con moto in D," all of which, while written in a dignified style, are pleasing in their melodic flow.

The Songs in Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro." Edited by Alberto Randegger. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Vocalists are to be congratulated upon having had prepared for them so admirable an edition as that under notice of the principal songs in Mozart's ever-green opera "Le Nozze di Figaro." To the young student and amateur singer Mozart's music at first sight seems to present comparatively few difficulties; but in reality this great master has so distinctive a style that it is seldom that perfect expression is given to his music even by professional vocalists. In a brief preface the editor, drawing attention to the chief cause of the common failure to do justice to Mozart's vocal compositions, says: "Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention. With this object in view a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text. In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired." There can be little doubt that these translations will prove very helpful to all singers, and especially to such as do not possess a perfect acquaintance with the Italian language. The alterations and cadences used by many eminent artists have been added in small type above Mozart's original music.

The first volume of this edition contains the songs of the Countess, and comprises "Porgi amor," the beautiful "Dove sono," and "Al desio di chi t'adora," the last-named composed in 1789. The second number includes Susanna's songs, "Deh vieni, non tardar" and "Un moto di gioja," and Cherubino's famous air "Voi, che sapete," and the vivacious ditty "Non so più cosa son." The third book is devoted to that important personage, Figaro, the songs given being "Se vuol ballare," "Non più andrai," and "Aprite un po' quegl' occhi." Only two songs are included in the fourth selection, but these are "Vedrò mentr' io sospiro" and the famous "La Vendetta," which it will be remembered are severally sung by the Count and Bartolo. The marks of expression and phrasing are in accordance with the best traditions, the music is printed with the utmost clearness, and the issue is a valuable addition to the fine series of vocal albums published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The fine Parish Church at Cromer has just been enriched by the addition of a new four-manual organ, built by Messrs. Norman and Beard. It consists of forty speaking stops and has cost nearly £900. The handsome gothic case which encloses the instrument is that lately removed from Bath Abbey. The Rev. L. Meadows White, formerly curate of Cromer, and a first-rate organist, presided at the opening ceremony and gave two recitals.

Under the superintendence of Miss Penley an excellent ballad concert was given in the Marina Theatre, Lowestoft, on the 1st ult. The artists were Miss Rose Pilcher, Miss Sievewright, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Ernest Hodgson, and Mr. Percival Sessions, vocalists; Miss Adela Verne was the solo pianist, and Mr. H. D. Flowers accompanied.

The Wellingborough Prize Choir, winners of the Jubilee Choral Contest at Earl's Court lately, gave an evening concert in the Town Hall, Hunstanton, on the 9th ult. The selections given by the choir, numbering about fifty voices, were sung with considerable finish.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH AND PERTH.

The battle is set in array for the winter, and the first thing which strikes the enthusiast for orchestral music is that Richter is not to give his usual concert this year. It seems that we are to suffer for the shortcomings of the second city in the empire, and as the visit of the Paladin of conductors to Glasgow does not pay, Scotland has been cut out of his triumphal procession. The Scottish Orchestra has at least one more year's lease to run, and is to appear under Mr. Kes's guidance at the eleventh annual series of orchestral and choral concerts organised by Messrs. Paterson and Sons. The list of players is again headed by the name of Mr. Maurice Sons, and the solo artists represent, as in former years, the best talent available. At the choral concerts (two in number) "St. Paul" is to be undertaken by the Edinburgh Choral Union; later in the season Mr. Kirkhope's choir will sustain the choral music in the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," when Miss Ella Russell and Mr. Brozel will sing the music allotted to Elsa and Lohengrin. Important novelties on the programme prospectus are a Symphony by Volkmann, the new "Highland Memories" Suite by Hamish MacCunn, and works by Korsakoff and Glazounow.

The Edinburgh Choral Union intends giving "Solomon" at its own concert in the spring, as well as "St. Paul," already mentioned, and the usual New Year's Day performance of "The Messiah."

The miscellaneous recitals and concerts announced by Messrs. Paterson and Sons promise opportunities of hearing Edvard Grieg (who is to be assisted at his vocal and instrumental recital by M. Johannes Wolff and Madame Medora Henson), also Madame Albani and Miss Fanny Davies, Messrs. Eugene d'Albert, Petschnikoff, Gabrilowitsch, and Miss Osborne.

Messrs. Methven and Simpson have the distinction of announcing a recital by M. Paderewski in November, and later in the season M. Siloti and Mdlle. Pancera are to give pianoforte recitals under their auspices.

In conjunction with Messrs. Methven and Simpson, Messrs. Harrison have arranged the usual series of ballad concerts, at which the following distinguished artists will appear: Madame Melba, Miss Esther Palliser, Mdlle. Nina Faliero, Madame Belle Cole, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Ben Davies, David Popper, Loewenssohn, Louis Pecskai, and many others.

The local societies in Perth are busily occupied with preparations for their winter's work. The Musical Society has decided on a concert performance of "Tannhäuser," and another example of platform opera is promised by Mr. Richardson's choir, who will give "Faust." Later in the season the same society will also perform Handel's "Samson." The Orchestral Society will give its annual concert in December; and, lastly, Mr. Graves's operatic company have commenced rehearsals for a performance of Sullivan's "Iolanthe."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The choral rehearsals of the Philharmonic Society were resumed, under Mr. Branscombe, on the 6th ult., and the first concert is to be given on the 12th inst. The Harrison series are now announced on similar lines to those heretofore followed, and so also are the concerts exploited during several seasons past by Messrs. Thomas Shaw and Percy White. The Musical Society, under Mr. D. O. Parry, is stated to be contemplating a concert production of Mascagni's "Rustic Chivalry," and the Post Office Choral Society promises Gade's "Psyche" early in December, under Mr. Clarke. So far there is nothing else to chronicle or forecast. The past months have been absolutely devoid of musical interest, and the season which is ahead appears to bear promise of but little.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

At the moment I write no definite announcements have been published with respect to what will be attempted by the larger societies during the approaching winter. Of course with the closing weeks of October the Hallé concerts, which were so successful last season under Mr. Cowen's direction, will be resumed. It is understood that no substantial change in the management or in the composition of the orchestra will be made. Mr. R. H. Wilson will still have charge of the choir and Mr. C. H. Fogg will preside at the organ. The choral novelties spoken of are Berlioz's "Les Troyens" and Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal," but the "Flying Dutchman" and sundry selections from "Tannhäuser" will be repeated. A large number of attractive soloists, vocal and instrumental, will appear; and every exertion is promised that may tend to secure the continuance of the high popularity of the subscription concerts which have, for so many years, played a most important part in raising the musical taste of the North of England, and have established a gauge of merit and completeness whereby all our greater undertakings are now judged. The admirable Brodsky concerts will, assuredly, go on. No greater misfortune could happen than the occurrence of anything which would endanger their firm establishment; and it is hoped that during the interval between the destruction, next spring, of the old concert hall in Peter Street and the completion of the much larger and finer room in the Midland Hotel, which is to be erected on its site, a suitable home (probably in the Athenæum) may be found for chamber music, which is now, at last, obtaining a hold upon the public taste which it could not gain in times past when our art was regarded less seriously, and its higher educational value was not appreciated according to its real merit. There would be a great appropriateness in the temporary transfer of Mr. Brodsky's exquisitely refined quartet party to the hall where, in former years, what may justly be called chamber choral music was very diligently studied.

Doubtless, at the Schiller Anstalt, Mr. Carl Fuchs will renew his well directed efforts in the production of works which are there heard to great advantage, and are so thoroughly enjoyed, not only by those who mainly support the institution, but also by those of their English friends who are privileged to attend. The meetings of the Vocal Society, under the careful direction of Dr. Watson, will doubtless attract as heretofore, and in due time our smaller suburban associations will tell us of their plans.

On Saturday evenings we shall have, occasionally, Mr. G. W. Lane's Philharmonic Choir; and, more regularly, the miscellaneous entertainments which Mr. Cross prepares at the Y.M.C.A.; as well as Mr. Pyne's excellent organ recitals at the Town Hall.

The council of the Royal Manchester College of Music liberally granted the use of the building for the 16th, 17th, and 18th ult. to Mr. J. S. Curwen for a Tonic Sol-fa demonstration. The meetings were generally interesting and instructive. Teachers from London and elsewhere came to display their modes of imparting information to very serious and attentive audiences. Perhaps the many versions of what was called a "Model lesson" to children became a little wearisome to those who were constant in their attendance; but a spirit of earnestness was maintained throughout.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The various musical societies are now showing signs of activity in preparation for the coming season. The prospectus of the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union announces that at the first concert, on November 16, Haydn's "Creation" will be performed, with Madame Zippora Monteith, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle as principals. The band and chorus will number 400. A popular performance of the "Creation" will also be given by the same Society on January 26, with Mdlle. Bertha Rossow, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle as soloists. At the second concert, on March 31, Mr. Edward Elgar's "King Olaf" will be given, with Madame Duma, Mr. James Leyland, and Mr. Watkin Mills as principals. This Society will also give a Christmas performance of "The Messiah," for which Miss Maggie Davies, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. David Hughes have been engaged. The Choral Union has been wonderfully successful during the past two or three years in reviving an interest in important works for chorus and orchestra in Newcastle, and with such a programme there is every prospect of another successful season.

On the 14th inst. a performance of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" will be given with orchestra in St. George's Church, Newcastle, under the direction of Mr. James M. Preston. The soloists will be Master Percy Hale and Mr. L. C. Guthrie.

The Sunderland Philharmonic Society will perform, at its first concert, Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," with Madame Duma, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Dan Price as principals. At Christmas a performance of "The Messiah" will be given, and early in the year Mr. Edward Elgar's "King Olaf" will be performed. The band and chorus of the Society number about 200 and the conductor is Mr. N. Kilburn.

The South Shields Choral Society announces Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" and Goetz's "Nœnia" on December 8, with Miss Jeanie Ranken, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. Charles Copland as soloists; and at the second concert, on March 30, Gounod's "Redemption," for which Madame Duma, Mr. James Leyland, and Mr. Watkin Mills have been engaged. Band and chorus will number about 200 and Mr. M. Fairs will conduct.

The Newcastle Chamber Music Society announces a further series of four concerts. The first will be given by the Richter Orchestra, on the 19th inst., and the remaining three will be chamber concerts, at which the Cologne String Quartet, led by Herr Willy Hess; the Queen's Hall Quartet, led by Señor Arbos; and the Bohemian String Quartet, led by Herr Karel Hoffman, will appear.

Mr. George F. Vincent is giving a series of organ recitals, on Monday evenings, in St. Thomas's Church, Sunderland, which are very largely attended. These recitals have been given in the autumn for fourteen successive years and are extremely popular.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The usual autumnal revival is taking place among local musical societies and we anticipate a busy season. The chief event in the immediate future is the forthcoming visit of Dr. Richter and orchestra. Mr. F. H. Cowen and the Hallé Manchester Orchestra are also expected. Madame Melba will sing at the first of the Harrison subscription concerts. Miss M. Foxon announces a series of chamber concerts at which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Plunket Greene will appear. In regard to choral societies, the Amateur Musical (Mr. Schöllhammer, conductor), the senior society, will introduce Mr. Elgar's "King Olaf." The committee are to be congratulated in having reverted to their old policy of producing novelties at their winter concerts. The Musical Union (Dr. H. Coward) announces three concerts. Works will be selected from "Hymn of Praise," Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," Arnott's "Lochinvar," Stanford's "Revenge," and Sterndale Bennett. The Choral Union (Mr. S. Suckley) will perform the third acts of "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" at its opening concert. The St. Cecilia Choral Society (Mr. Wm. Brown) is rehearsing Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." "Elijah," which is to follow later on, is very popular here—as elsewhere—specially owing to its success at last year's festival. The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society will open with the "Hymn of Praise." Elgar's "King Olaf" is under consideration for the second concert. Dr. Coward has been appointed conductor vice Mr. A. Benton.

The St. Peter's (Abbeydale) Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," on the 9th ult., under Mr. W. Gadsby. Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles" and Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" are included in the society's scheme for the coming season.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

The return from the country of Parisian society usually occurs between the 1st and 15th inst., and musical events of any special importance can hardly be looked for previous to that period. At the Opéra all efforts are concentrated just now upon the forthcoming first production of "Die Meistersinger," which is being rehearsed with a double cast, some of the parts being even trebly provided for. The next novelty to be placed in rehearsal after "Die Meistersinger" will be "Gauthier d'Aquitaine," by M. Paul Vidal.

The Opéra Comique re-opened its doors on the 1st ult. with "La Dame Blanche," subsequent performances including "Carmen," "Le Barbier de Seville," "Cavalleria," "Mireille," "Phryné," "Mignon," and "Lakmé." "Werther" was given, on the 12th ult., with a new cast. M. Massenet's new opera "Sapho," written to a libretto by MM. Cain and Bernède (founded upon M. Daudet's novel), is in course of preparation here; Madame Calvé will create the very important part of Fanny Legrand, and Mdlle. Wyns that of Divonne. The première is not, however, likely to take place before the end of next month, and will be preceded by that of M. Lucien Lambert's "Le Spahi." M. Carvalho has also accepted for performance a new work by M. Bruneau, entitled "Le Cyclone," and a comic opera in three acts by M. Samuel Rousseau, "Le Dernier Bandit," the plot of which has been supplied to the librettist, M. Georges Montorgue, by M. Emmanuel Arène's novel.

At the Opéra Populaire, established during the summer months at the Théâtre de la Porte Saint Martin, performances have been given of "Lucia," "Le Voyage en Chine," and other equally well-worn productions. Recently, however, the directors have ventured upon bringing out a work new to Paris—viz., "La Coupe et les Lèvres," a lyrical drama in five acts and six tableaux, by M. Ernest d'Hervilly (after Alfred de Musset's story), the music by M. Gustave Canoby. The work is already thirty years old, and was produced at Rouen in 1890. The music frequently betrays the influence of Meyerbeer and Halévy; but it abounds in melodiousness and true lyrical accents, and one cannot but regret that its performance did not take place at an earlier period, when the forms employed by the composer had not as yet become somewhat antiquated. MM. Engel, Pagès, Génégaud, and Sureau, Mesdames Lloyd, Salambiani, and Montmain were very able representatives of leading parts.

MM. Pugno and Ysaye have entered into an engagement for a concert tour in the United States, and M. Guilmant, the eminent organist, also intends giving a series of recitals there.

There is talk of M. Saint-Saëns's "Proserpine" being brought out at Milan, with Madame Héglon, of the Opéra, in the titular part.

The Association of German Pianoforte Manufacturers has decided to take part in the International Exhibition to be held here in the year 1900.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The holidays are well-nigh over. The past three or four seasons have been disastrous to the vast majority of musicians throughout the country who have not been blessed with good salaried positions. Vocal teachers have suffered most of all. The profession at large, however, trusts that the "bad times" are coming to an end, and that a period of plenty is about to be inaugurated.

To find competent adult choristers is here a very difficult matter. The best are of English birth. Would that there were more of them available. The American church singer appears to be not to the manner born. He frequently sings well, and in denominational churches can hold his end, but in the choral service of the Episcopal Church he is not yet at home. More Englishmen of the right stamp would be welcome in some quarters, at any rate. Salaries are still good, for the supply of competent men does not equal the demand. Tenor soloists are paid £100 to £200 and upwards; bass soloists, £100 to £150 and upwards; alto soloists (the voice is not popular in this country), £80 to £125. First-rate chorus tenors can command £60 to £100; ditto, basses, £40 to £80; ditto, altos, £50 to £70. Men who are thoroughly competent choristers in every respect, and who are besides good clerks, salesmen, &c., should certainly seek their modest fortunes in New York City. Candidates should refrain from coming between May 1 and September 1, during which period no permanent appointments are made.

Mr. Horatio W. Parker, professor of music in Yale University, has completed a new oratorio dealing with the giant Cristoforus, a personage already subjected to musical treatment by Rheinberger, Professor Parker's master in the art of composition some years ago. Rumour speaks warmly of the newer work, which it is to be hoped will ere long be published and performed.

Mr. Clement R. Gale, organist and choirmaster of Calvary Church, New York, and choirmaster of St. George's Church, Newburgh, New York, has been appointed conductor of the Troy Vocal Society.

Mr. Sumner Salter, well known as organist, pianist, teacher, and journalist, was lately elected president of the New York State Music Teachers' Association for the present year.

Mr. Walter Damrosch will be so busy this season with opera in and out of New York that he will give no evening concerts with his fine orchestra. He will, moreover, be unable to conduct the performances of the Choral Society, which will probably be under the direction of his brother, Mr. Frank Damrosch, who has done some excellent work with the Musical Art Society, a company of some sixty picked professional singers, organised by himself, and largely supported by society, the general public, and the press.

It is rumoured that Mr. Walter H. Hall, organist and choirmaster of St. James's Church, New York, contemplates the formation of a chorus for the performance of oratorio in this city in conjunction with his Brooklyn Oratorio Society. It is to be hoped that this rumour will come true, for though Mr. Hall does not yet succeed in imparting his own evident enthusiasm to his singers, he achieves a finish which is rare in this country at present.

The Worcester (Mass.) Music Festival was announced to commence on the 20th, and continues till the 24th ult., under the direction of Herr Carl Zerrahn, who has been restored to the position he occupied for many years, up to two years ago, when Mr. Lang was appointed. The principal works to be performed are "The Redemption," "Samson and Dalila," H. W. Parker's "Hora novissima," and Goring Thomas's "The swan and the skylark." American critics, notably Mr. Krehbiel, begin to wonder why it is that Stanford, Mackenzie, and Parry continue to be neglected at these and similar festivals.

The vacancies in Trinity parish have not yet been filled, and probably will not be for some time to come. Five or six of the more important applicants have been "investigated," but that is all, so far.

Mr. William Carl, the distinguished organist of the first Presbyterian Church in this city, has been giving recitals successfully in Sweden.

It is now settled, to the great delight of all the organists who are likely to be able to hear him, that M. Guilmant will re-visit this country in the course of the coming season. M. Guilmant evoked great enthusiasm when he was here four years ago.

Mr. W. R. Chapman has organised and will direct two festivals in Maine—at Bangor and at Portland—next month. There will be a chorus of 1,000 voices at each place.

There were seven candidates for Associateship and Fellowship in the American Guild of Organists at the end of June last, of whom three satisfied the examiners; they were Harry Rowe Shelley, Homer Bartlett, and Clement R. Gale.

The Guildhall School of Music reports that amongst the special and school prizes recently awarded are the following:—The Lord Mayor's prize for sopranos, Bessie Spells; the Lady Mayoress's prize for pianists, G. Douglas Boxall; Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Ritchie's prize for mezzo-sopranos, Dina Harwood; Mr. Sheriff Rogers's prize for contraltos, Edith Clegg; the Chairman's prize for organ students, Frank Grant; the Knight prize for basses, Charles Hinchliff; the Jenkinson prize for pianists, Nellie Hills; the Alexander prize, Ethel Hyem; the Robinson prize for tenors, James W. Dempster; the Robinson prize for the best accompanist, K. Tester Jones; the Tubbs prize for violinists, Bertha Bruckshaw; the Carwardine prize for violinists, Fanny Woolf; the Newman prize for sight singing, Emily Kingsford; the Cobbett prize for composition, H. Waldo Warner; the Libotton Memorial prize, Charles Crabb. Those who won the Associateship of the school (A.G.S.M.) are: Lily Rendle, gold medalist (pianoforte); Lilian Clarke, silver medalist (pianoforte); Henry Sowerbutts, bronze medalist (singing); Minnie S. Crouch, with honours (pianoforte); Grace M. Hudson (pianoforte), Alice M. Idle (pianoforte), Albert E. Denman (pianoforte), Adeline M. Jelf (pianoforte), Ernest A. Matheson (pianoforte), Catherine Higgs (pianoforte), Minnie E. Cook (pianoforte), E. Blanche Stone (singing), Amy Lott (singing), John Johnson (singing), Adeline Cox, with honours (elocution).

At St. James's Hall, on the afternoons of the 28th inst. and November 5, an entertainment of somewhat novel character will be given by the Greek baritone, Mr. Aramis. The first part will consist of a vocal recital, by Mr. Aramis and Miss Saint-André, of Greek popular songs, partly from M. Bourgault-Ducoudray's collection, partly from those gathered by Mr. Aramis from Greek peasants and mountaineers. In the second part Mdlle. Sandrini, première danseuse of the Paris Grand Opéra, will give illustrations of the historical development of dancing, from the earliest times to the present day. M. Bourgault-Ducoudray, who is Professor of Musical History at the Paris Conservatoire, has arranged the scheme, and will himself play the pianoforte accompaniments, and explanatory comments will be delivered by Mr. E. F. Jacques.

The West Kent College of Music just opened at Lee, Kent, with a branch at Sidcup, will afford ample opportunities to students in that locality. The college is under the combined directorship of Mr. Charles E. Ivimey and Mr. Hopkins Ould, all branches of the art being represented by a highly efficient staff of professors, which includes the names of many well-known teachers. Elocution (which should be an important study for vocalists) and languages have also their representative professors, and altogether the scheme gives abundant signs of promise in this rapidly growing locality, which has, till now, not been provided with such efficient means of musical culture. The secretary is Colonel S. E. Atkinson, 112, Burnt Ash Road, Lee.

Mr. Henry J. B. Dart has been appointed director of the music section of the Borough Polytechnic Institute, Borough Road, the duties including the conductorship of the choral society and the orchestral society of the Institute. It is hoped to give a performance of Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Building of the Ship" at an early date. At the same Institute a harmony and counterpoint class will be started, under the direction of Dr. W. John Reynolds; while Mr. Walter Attersoll and Mr. Maurice Koopman will be respectively answerable for men's class singing and the violoncello class.

The well-known firm of pianoforte makers, Ernst Rosenkranz, in Dresden, celebrated, in July last, the 100th anniversary of its existence. Founded by Ernst Phillip Rosenkranz, a man of great ability, energy, and resource, the business remained with the family for three generations, and during that time obtained a world-wide reputation. Its present chief, Herr Paul Hohl, is an authority on technical subjects connected with the industry.

Samuel Wesley's fine motet "Exultate Deo" ("Sing aloud with gladness") will be sung at the Harvest Festival, St. Anne's, Soho, by the united choirs of St. Jude's, South Kensington, and of the church, on the 8th inst., at 8 p.m. As the organ is being enlarged, the service will be unaccompanied throughout. The Bishop of London is to preach.

An important sale of autographs is to be held on the 11th inst. and following days, by Mr. Leo Lippmannssohn, in Berlin. It will include letters and other documents written by Berlioz, Bülow, Donizetti, Gade, Hummel, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Rossini, Schumann, Spohr, Verdi, Wagner, and Weber.

Messrs. Jack, of Edinburgh, announced that they would publish, on the 30th ult., the eighth volume of "English Minstrelsie," thus bringing to a completion Mr. Baring Gould's monumental work on English national song. In all some 350 songs are printed, and the antiquarian notes are voluminous.

"Verdi: Man and Musician," is the title of a monograph, now in the press, by Mr. Frederick J. Crowest. The book will be illustrated with several portraits.

At the production of an English version of Rosmer's play, "Königskinder," at the Court Theatre shortly, Herr Humperdinck's incidental music, which has achieved so great a success in Germany, will be rendered by a greatly augmented orchestra under Mr. Carl Armbruster.

At the Portsmouth Festival of the National Temperance Choral Union the chief choral prize was won by the Nottingham Tabernacle Choir, under Mr. Riley. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

The Queen has graciously presented the Jubilee Medal to Mdlle. Janotha, who has recently been twice commanded to perform before Her Majesty and the Royal Family at Osborne.

Mr. Arthur Payne will again act as conductor of the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society this season, owing to the continued illness of the regular conductor, Mr. George Kitchin.

The Royal Carl Rosa Company's opera season at Covent Garden will open to-morrow, the 2nd inst., with Puccini's "La Bohème."

FOREIGN NOTES.

Alsheim.—A somewhat rare double jubilee was celebrated here on August 22—viz., the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the male choir "Sängerbund" and that of Herr Marx, in his capacity of conductor of that Society.

Antwerp.—The Music School founded by M. Peter Benoit, the distinguished Flemish composer, having just received its charter as a Royal Conservatoire, the event was celebrated, on the 12th ult., by musical performances and ceremonies which largely took the form of homage rendered to the founder. Two of M. Benoit's works, "De Strijdkreet" and "Reis de wereld rond," were performed at the Grand Place, in the open air, and in the evening a festival hymn, composed by him for the Exhibition of 1885, was sung in the Concert Hall by a choir numbering over a thousand voices, under the direction of M. Mortelmans.

Bayreuth.—This year's Festspiele came to a close on August 19 with the 100th performance of "Parsifal," in which Fräulein von Mildenburg, Herren Grüning, Grengg, and Perron took part, Herr Anton Seidl being the conductor. The audience—amongst whom, as on the preceding occasions, the English and French predominated—were most enthusiastic. There will be no performances next year, while for 1899 three representations of the "Ring" and eight of "Parsifal" are planned, with, perhaps, some additional performances of "Die Meistersinger."

Berlin.—Madame Gemma Bellincioni appeared in a series of performances at the New Royal Opera here last month, including "Carmen," "Cavalleria," "Trovatore," and "Fille du Regiment," in all of which the gifted artist aroused quite a storm of enthusiasm.——Several new works are in process of being mounted at the old Opera-house, amongst them "Lobedanz," by Professor Ludwig Thuille, of Munich, and a two-act musical comedy entitled "Das hölzerne Schwert," by Herr Heinrich Zöllner, the well-known New York conductor. Both these are to be brought out during the present month. Spinelli's successful "A basso Porto" is likewise in preparation both here and at several other leading German theatres. Humperdinck's "Die Königskinder" is to be produced at the Royal Schauspielhaus, the smaller dimensions of which, as compared with the Opera, being judged more suitable to the character of the work.——The Symphony Concerts, under the direction of Herr Weingartner, will be resumed on the 4th inst., and those of the Philharmonic Society, under Herr Nikisch, on the 11th. Amongst the works to be produced during the present season by the Philharmonic Choir, conducted by Herr Siegfried Ochs, are Gluck's "Orpheus," Handel's "Samson," "Snöfried," by Stenhammar, and "Der Hagestolz," by Arnold Mendelssohn; the two latter for the first time.——The post of second violin in the Joachim Quartet, vacated by Herr Kruse, has been taken by Professor Carl Halir.——Herr Moritz Moszkowski, the composer, for many years resident here, is about to take up his residence in the French capital.——A monograph on the life and works of Johannes Brahms, from the pen of the well-known musical author Dr. Heinrich Reimann, is to be published this month as the first volume of a series entitled "Famous Musicians," issued by the Harmonie Publishing Company.

Brussels.—Some excellent concert performances were given during last month at the Exhibition Hall by the Société Royale des Mélomanes of Ghent and the Concordia Choral Society of Aix-la-Chapelle, under the direction of Herr R. Kuhe. The Théâtre de la Monnaie re-opened its doors on the 1st ult. with Gounod's "Faust." M. Bruneau's "Messidor," M. Massenet's "Hérodiade," and Wagner's "Die Walküre" and "Die Meistersinger" will be produced here during the season.

Budapest.—The new season of the Royal Opera was inaugurated on the 1st ult., with a performance of Goldmark's "The Cricket on the Hearth," the popularity of which would seem to be still in the ascendant. Leoncavallo's "La Bohème" is to be produced during the season, and, on the 4th inst., a new two-act opera, "Maritta," by the Hungarian composer, Carl Aggházy, will be performed for the first time. The 200th performance of Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" was recorded here on the 11th ult.

Buenos Ayres.—A very successful first performance took place here, on July 27, of a three-act opera entitled "Pampa," the work of a native composer, Señor Arturo Berutti.

Carlsruhe.—The special operatic performances at the Grand Ducal Theatre, under the direction of Herr Felix Mottl, commenced, on the 5th ult., with "Tristan und Isolde," followed, on the 7th, by "Die Zauberflöte." The highly interesting scheme, which, besides others of Wagner's works, also included Berlioz' "La Prise de Troie" and "Les Troyens à Carthage," and Beethoven's "Fidelio," concluded, on the 30th ult., with the performance of Gluck's "Orphée."

Copenhagen.—A monument was unveiled here, last month, erected to Niels Gade, the well known Danish composer, whose works have met with much appreciation also in England. Several members of the Danish Royal family assisted at the ceremony.

Eisenach.—The Richard Wagner Museum has recently been enriched by several important acquisitions, not the least interesting of which is the quaint little pianoforte used by the master while under the tuition of Theodor Weinlig, the worthy Cantor of the Leipzig Thomas-Schule. The original score of "Rienzi" has likewise been added to the unique collection, which, since its opening to the public, in June last, has attracted a number of visitors.

Hamburg. — Performances at the Stadt-Theater re-commenced on the 1st ult., and from the prospectus issued it would appear that Herr Pollini, the managing director, is determined to uphold his justly acquired reputation for zeal and enterprise in bringing out new works. Amongst these, in addition to Humperdinck's "Die Königskinder" and Leoncavallo's "La Bohème," may be instanced a comic opera, "Die fromme Helene" (the libretto founded upon Wilhelm Busch's humorous story), by Adalbert von Goldschmidt, as well as the same composer's already much advertised trilogy entitled "Gœa," Bungert's "Odysseus' Heimkehr," and an opera, "König Magnus," by Herr Nordermann. Von Goldschmidt's trilogy has been in course of preparation here for some time past, special sketches for the scenery having been supplied by the painter, Herr Franz Stuck.

Hanover.—Hitherto, Hanover, the only German city of corresponding size and importance which could not boast its duly appointed musical Conservatorium, is at length to be furnished with such an Institution, which is to be opened in the course of the present month. Herr Leimer, for the last thirteen years the director of the Königsberg Conservatorium, will be the Principal, and there will be a highly efficient staff of professors, including the pianist, Herr Evers, Kammersänger Brune, and the distinguished organist, Herr Wuthmann.

Leipzig.—The concert season at the Gewandhaus is announced to re-commence on the 7th inst. with a performance dedicated to the memory of Brahms, in which Herren Kraus, of Vienna, and Willy Rehberg, of Geneva, will take part.——The Symphony Concerts of the Winderstein Orchestra are to be resumed on the 19th inst. Admirably compiled programmes and popular prices of admission are leading features of this young Institution, which is rapidly assuming a prominent position in the musical life here.

Meiningen.—The first monument to be erected to Brahms will probably be in this little capital. The Duke of Saxe-Meiningen is taking a warm interest in the matter, and some substantial contributions towards the necessary fund have already been forthcoming. Meanwhile a committee has also been formed, with a similar object in view, at the composer's native town of Hamburg.

Milan.—The Teatro Lirico, under the management of Signor Sonzogno, inaugurates a new season, on the 7th inst., with Massenet's "Werther" and the ballet "Coppélia," by Délibes. Some twenty-five different operatic works are to be produced during the present season, which is likely to prove a most successful one, since, owing to the withdrawal of its subvention by the Municipality, the Theatre della Scala will remain closed during the winter.

Moscow.—The authorities of the Moscow Conservatoire have been singularly unfortunate so far in their endeavours to fill the vacant professorship for pianoforte playing. The post has been declined in turn by M. Risler, Professor Kwast, and Mr. Frederick Lamond. Perhaps, after all, some native professor may be found able and willing to supply the want?

Munich.—Dr. Loewe, of Vienna, conducted a very fine performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Kaim orchestra and choir, on August 20, at which many of the visitors to the just concluded Bayreuth Festspiele assisted. Dr. Loewe, who also conducted some of the preceding Beethoven concerts given here recently, has accepted the permanent conductorship of the Kaim orchestra, vacated some time since by Herr Zumpe.——Herr Richard Strauss has been offered the conductorship of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, in succession to Herr Mahler. Efforts are being made, however, on the part of the authorities of the Royal Opera here to retain him in his present position and the matter is still pending. Meanwhile Herr Strauss is engaged upon a new symphonic poem, illustrating "in the form of variations," we understand (or rather fail to understand, at present), the world of ideas represented in "Don Quixote," the principal theme symbolising, on the one hand, the idealism of the hapless Knight, in the minor key, and the "too, too solid flesh" (in the major key) of his redoubtable Squire on the other.

Prague.—Ernst Rosmer's (otherwise Madame Elsa Bernstein's) dramatised fairy tale "Die Königskinder," with Herr Humperdinck's music, was brought out at the German Theatre, on August 23, and very favourably received, notwithstanding the manifest weakness of the libretto. The critics, while admiring the melodiousness and originality of the score, express surprise at the composer of "Hansel und Gretel" having chosen this book for musical illustration. The performance, under the direction of Herr Schalk, and with Fräulein Dora Erl and Herr Erich Schmidt in leading parts, was a very satisfactory one, and Herr Humperdinck, who was present, was accorded a most enthusiastic reception.——Smetana's opera "Dalibor" was produced at the National Theatre, on August 29, in the presence of representatives of the Imperial Viennese Opera, where the work is to be performed for the first time early this month.

St. Petersburg.—By desire of their Imperial Majesties, a season of German opera is to take place during the coming winter, at the Marie Theatre, which will be devoted chiefly to the performance of Wagner's music-dramas. Madame Therese Malten, Herren Reichmann and Wallnöfer, and other leading artists, have already been engaged, and Herr Loewe, of Breslau, will be the conductor. It is also said that, under the patronage of the Czarina, the brothers de Reszke are arranging for a series of performances of Wagner's operas, both here and in Moscow and other Russian towns, beginning in March next, with the co-operation of Mesdames Eames and Moran-Olden, Herr Reichmann, and others, and with Dr. Hans Richter as conductor.

Stockholm.—Andreas Hallén, the well known Swedish composer, has just completed the score of an orchestral work entitled "The Island of the Dead," inspired by the painting, similarly named, of Professor Boecklin, the eminent Swiss painter. Herr Hallén, who is the principal conductor of the Royal Opera, has also nearly completed a new operatic work upon a national subject, "The Treasure of Waldemar," to be produced at the inauguration of the fine new Opera-house in this capital.

Venice.—Signor Antonio Smareglia's new four-act opera "Falena" was produced for the first time on the 4th ult., at the Rossini Theatre, and very well received, the first act and the Finale of the last more especially producing a very marked impression. The performance was a very good one, with Signora Cucini in the titular part.

Vienna.—The 100th performance of "Die Meistersinger" was recorded at the Imperial Opera on August 19. Dr. Hans Richter conducted and was the recipient of a perfect ovation on the part of a very numerous audience. A complete performance of the "Nibelungen Ring" took place between August 25 and 29, under Herr Mahler's direction, "Rheingold" being given, as at Bayreuth, without a break, and manifestly to the satisfaction of an enthusiastic public. ——Operatic performances by a company of twenty-four boys, of ages varying from eleven to sixteen, under the direction of the Maëstro Alfredo Soffredini, are just now being given with immense success in connection with the "Venice in Vienna" Exhibition. The works interpreted by these clever juveniles are "Il piccolo Haydn," "Salvatorello," and "Aurora," all of them from the pen of Signor Soffredini.

Worms.—The Municipal Festspielhaus will re-open its doors, on the 8th inst., with the production of a new opera, "Die Zerstöning von Worms," by Herr Dokovicz, of which a series of performances is to be given. During the remainder of the season performances are to be given alternately by the personnel of the theatres of Darmstadt, Mannheim, and Mayence.

OBITUARY.

We regret to record the death of George Augustus Löhr, which occurred at his residence, Belmont Villas, Leicester, on August 25, at the age of seventy-six. This highly esteemed musician, who was born at Norwich, April 23, 1821, began his musical career as a chorister at Magdalen College, Oxford. For ten years he was assistant-organist to Dr. Zechariah Buck, organist of Norwich Cathedral, where he acquired some of that distinguished choir-trainer's skill. When Mr. Löhr became organist of St. Margaret's, Leicester, in 1845—which appointment he held for forty years—that church soon became famous for its choir. Moreover, the deceased organist was the pioneer of choral services in Leicester, and one of the earliest to promote musical harvest festivals. For many years he was conductor of the Amateur Harmonic Society, and in many ways the departed musician has left his stamp upon the musical life of Leicester. Mr. Löhr is widely known by his skilful four-part arrangement of "But the Lord is mindful of His own" (The Musical Times, No. 137). Mr. Harvey Löhr is his son. The interment took place at Leicester Cemetery and was largely attended, the Mayor being present.

Much sympathy will be felt for the veteran Mr. Charles Lockey in the death of his wife, which occurred at Hastings, on August 28, at the age of seventy-six. The elder of two sisters, formerly noted for their finished duet singing, Martha Rae Williams was born at Bitterley, near Ludlow, in 1821. She and her sister studied under Tom Cooke and Signor Negri. They soon established a reputation in oratorio and other concerts, dating from 1839, which included some of the Three Choir Festivals. They more especially came into notice at the Birmingham Musical Festival of 1846, when they sang the duet (subsequently changed to a trio) "Lift thine eyes" on the production of "Elijah" under Mendelssohn's direction. Mendelssohn, in a letter describing this initial performance, referred to the two sisters as "a couple of excellent second soprano and contralto solo singers," the latter being the lady whose death we regret to record. On May 24, 1853, Miss Martha Williams was married to Mr. Charles Lockey, the original tenor in "Elijah," whose refined singing called forth a well-merited eulogy from Mendelssohn. Curiously enough, Miss Williams and her future husband, Mr. Lockey, both made their first appearances at the Antient Concerts on the same night, April 29, 1846, when the concert was under the direction of the Prince Consort. In those days such an engagement gave young artists an important status in their profession. Mrs. Lockey retired from professional life in 1865.

The news has come by cablegram of, we fear, the somewhat sudden death of Thomas Tallis Trimnell, which occurred at Wellington, New Zealand, on the 15th ult. The deceased, who was the son of a lay clerk at Bristol Cathedral, was born at Bristol, October 13, 1827. At the age of eight he became a chorister at the Cathedral, and was subsequently articled to J. D. Corfe, the Cathedral organist. He held organ appointments successively at Clifton, Chesterfield, and Sheffield Parish Church, where he remained from 1875 to 1886. In the latter year he went to New Zealand, where he was at first organist of St. Mary's, Parnell, Auckland; and, later, of St. Peter's, Wellington. It was only in our last issue (p. 605) that we specially referred to the departed musician. Mr. Trimnell gave frequent organ recitals both in England and in New Zealand. He composed several services and anthems, one of which, "The earth is the Lord's," was performed at the opening of the Wellington Exhibition, November 18, 1896. He graduated Mus. Bac., Oxford, in 1875.

It is very remarkable that an old organist should play the Dead March for his successor before he became installed in his office, but such an event has happened at Windsor. When the Rev. J. H. Ellison became vicar of Windsor in May, 1895, Mr. Samuel Smith, who had been organist of the Parish Church for nearly thirty-four years, was superannuated, and Mr. Gilbert Tozer, who had been a chorister and assistant-organist of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, was appointed his successor. Unfortunately this spring he was in a delicate state of health, and at the latter end of June a respite from duty became imperative. He went to his home at Romford, where he gradually became weaker and died at an early age on the 17th ult. On the following Sunday evening a funeral sermon was preached, and upon Mr. Smith, who had undertaken the organist's duty pro tem., devolved the melancholy duty of playing the Dead March. Mr. Gilbert Tozer was related to Dr. Ferris Tozer, of Exeter.

Former pupils in England of the Leipzig Conservatorium will learn with regret of the death of Dr. Otto Günther, the director of that Institution, which occurred in Leipzig on the 12th ult. He was a lawyer by profession, and from 1867 to 1872 filled the office of a paid town councillor in his native Leipzig. During this period he became a member of the directorial boards of the Gewandhaus and the Royal Conservatorium, and president of both on the death of Schleinitz, in May, 1881. A few years ago he resigned the chairmanship of the Gewandhaus in order to devote himself solely to the Conservatorium. It is due to him that a students' orchestra and an opera school were introduced into the curriculum of that Institution, while the handsome new building in the Grassi Strasse, opened in 1887, owes its existence to a large extent to his untiring efforts. Dr. Günther, who was deservedly and universally esteemed, had nearly completed his seventy-fifth year.

Madame Marie Barbier, the wife of M. Jules Barbier, the celebrated librettist of "Faust" and "Mignon," died in Paris on August 21. Gifted with a fine soprano voice, she was in her earlier days a vocalist of considerable attainments and has also tried her hand at dramatic writing, two comedies from her pen having been successfully produced some years since at the Paris Vaudeville. Under the title of "Contes blancs" she published a series of children's stories and verses, which latter have been set to music by Gounod, Ambroise Thomas, Saint-Saëns, Rubinstein, and others. Madame Barbier was a charming hostess and her salon one of the most artistic in the French capital.

A young French composer of great promise, Alix Fournier, died at Joinville, on the 12th ult., at the age of thirty-two. He was a laureate at the Paris Conservatoire, and five years ago obtained the Cressent prize with a one-act opera, "Stratonice," which was performed several times at the Opéra, and, although somewhat coldly received, was considered by all connoisseurs a work of very high merit. M. Fournier also wrote several cantatas and a number of charming songs, and had just completed the score of a three-act opera entitled "Carloman," upon which he had concentrated his efforts for a considerable time past.

The death is announced, on August 22, of Frau Ottilie von Tschudi, née Von Schnorr, at her country seat of Jacobshof, near Lichtenegg, in Lower Austria. She was a member of the celebrated family of artists, the Schnorrs von Carolsfeld, the painter of the "Nibelungen," Julius von Schnorr, having been her uncle, and the house of her father the centre of a distinguished circle of painters and musicians, including Schubert, Schwind, Gänsbacher, Adam Müller, and many others. The deceased lady was the widow of Dr. von Tschudi, formerly Swiss Ambassador at the Court of Vienna, and her only son, Hugo von Tschudi, is the director of the National Gallery in Berlin.

The death occurred, on the 4th ult., at Graz, of Professor Hans Weinlich, the well-known vocal teacher, to whose excellent tuition many of the noted Continental singers owe their success. At one time Capellmeister at different German theatres, he took up his residence in Graz in 1868, and with his wife, the former prima donna, Louise Tipka, established the vocal academy and operatic school bearing his name. He was in his sixty-fifth year.

One of the most prolific composers of German Lieder, Wilhelm Heiser, died at Friedenau, near Berlin, on the 10th ult., at the advanced age of eighty-one. The number of his published songs, many of which have attained great popularity, exceeds 500, and there are many yet remaining in manuscript. He was a native of Berlin.

American papers record the death, on August 15, at Cincinnati, of the famous trumpet player, Heinrich Sievers, who distinguished himself by his heroism at the battle of Mars la Tour, in the Franco-German war, as a trumpeter in Bredow's brigade; and whom the poet Freiligrath has sung. Sievers went on an extensive concert tour, some years ago, in the United States, and has since been living at Cincinnati as a member of the municipal band.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On August 13, at Canton, Ohio, U.S., Victor Frei, organist, a native of Switzerland, aged forty-eight.

On August 24, at Loeben, F. Gerstenberg, for thirty years conductor of the Evangelical Choral Society in Vienna.

On August 28, at Budapest, Emerich Elbert, a promising young musician, composer of a successful opera, "Camorra," and a Professor at the Budapest Conservatoire.

On August 30, at Breslau, Bernhard Kothe, composer of Church music, senior Professor at the Catholic Seminary, aged seventy-six.

On the 6th ult., at Dresden, Carl Hess, Court pianist and composer of orchestral works and numerous pianoforte pieces.

THE CUCKOO'S NOTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—One of your correspondents, Mr. R. H. Whall, in your September number, calls your attention to an error in Mr. Krehbiel's book "How to listen to music," which was recently reviewed in your pages. Mr. Whall says at the close of his letter: "In regard to the question of the cuckoo, Mr. Krehbiel seems to take it for granted that the cuckoo sings always a minor third; the fact, of course, being that the interval varies between a minor third (or less) and a fourth."

There is a note in Gilbert White's "Selborne" (Bohn's Edition, 1878), page 330, signed "Mitford," which may interest your readers:—

"Concerning the singing of the cuckoo, mentioned by Mr. White, at page 142, I will add the following curious memoranda from the seventh volume of the 'Transactions of the Linnæan Society': 'The cuckoo begins early in the season with the interval of a minor third, the bird then proceeds to a major third, next to a fourth, then a fifth, after which his voice breaks without attaining a minor sixth.' This curious circumstance was, however, observed very long ago, and it forms the subject of an epigram in that scarce black-letter volume, 'The Epigrams of John Heywood, 1587.'"

The epigram alluded to is the following:—

> In April the Cuckoo can sing her song by rote,
> In June ofttime she cannot sing a note.
> At first, koo, koo; koo, koo; sings till can she do,
> At last, kooke, kooke, kooke; six kookes to one koo.—
> John Heywood, A.D. 1560.

The passage referred to in Gilbert White's "Selborne," page 142, is:—

"A neighbour of mine, who is said to have a nice ear, . . . finds, upon trial, that the note of the cuckoo (of which we have but one species) varies in different individuals; for, about Selborne Wood, he found they were mostly in D; he heard two sing together, the one in D and the other in D sharp, which made a disagreeable concert; he afterwards heard one in D sharp, and about Wolmer Forest, some in C."

Beethoven, who was himself a keen observer of Nature, in the delicious Andante of his most beautiful Pastoral Symphony, entitled "Scene by the brook," makes the cuckoo sing in company with the nightingale and quail:—

(Cuckoo.)

I am, yours sincerely,

Neston, Margaret A. Barrett.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. B. C.—(1) The terms "perfect" and "major" are somewhat arbitrary for practical purposes, and some theorists, Sir John Stainer amongst them, would like to see the former fall into disuse. The upper partial tones soonest coincide in the octave, fourth and fifth of the major scale, hence these intervals are termed "perfect" consonances, and the thirds and sixths (major and minor), "imperfect" consonances. (2) Apply to the secretary, Mr. Edward Chadfield, 19, Berners Street, London, W., who will send you all particulars about the Incorporated Society of Professional Musicians.

L. W. H. (Bath).—Mr. H. White, Hanway Street, Oxford Street, London, W., will probably supply your needs. Yes, Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" is arranged for pianoforte solo in Peters' Edition, No. 1,107a. Scarlatti's "Cat's Fugue" was so called because the subject is supposed to represent a cat walking upon the keys of the pianoforte. We shall always be glad to answer any questions that may be sent to us.

A. S.—We believe that the competition referred to on p. 622 of our last number is an international one. Full particulars, however, may be obtained by applying to Der Vorstand, Verein Beethoven-Haus, Bonn; or to Professor Dr. Joachim, Bendlerstrasse 17, Berlin.

An Earnest Student.—We cannot say if all the great pianists use the pedal exactly according to the edition to which you refer, but they probably would. The shake begins on A (the upper note of the trill) and is so continued throughout the passage.

W. M. D. La T.—Haydn's Third Mass is called the "Imperial Mass" because it was composed for the coronation of Joseph II., Emperor of Germany, 1765.

E. S. B.—The song you enquire about is "Love laid his sleepless head," by Sir Arthur Sullivan.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Corbridge.—A meeting was held at the Town Hall on the 8th ult. to take further steps in connection with forming a choral society in Corbridge. Mr. W. Brown, organist of the Parish Church, who has gratuitously undertaken the conductorship, presided, and there was a fair attendance. Fifty members have been enrolled, and there is every prospect that the career of the society will be attended with all the success which it deserves.

Gravesend.—The prospectus of the twentieth season of the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association has just been issued. The following works are announced to be performed: Bridge's "Flag of England," Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Bennett's "May Queen," and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Mr. Santley in his familiar part of the Prophet. There is also to be a ballad concert at which Mr. Ben Davies is to sing. The conductor will again be Mr. Charles R. Green, who has not only conducted this society for twenty years, but has been appointed to a similar post in connection with the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society.

Handsworth.—At the first meeting of the fourth session of the St. James's Choral Society, held on the 13th ult., the hon. conductor, Mr. Richard Richards, was presented with a very handsome testimonial, consisting of an ivory gold-mounted baton and an illuminated address and several volumes of musical works. The next work to be given by the society will be the "Hymn of Praise."

Jersey and Guernsey.—A triple recital—violin, pianoforte, and vocal—was given in these islands on the 8th and 9th ult., by Miss Ethel Barns, Miss Marie Olson, and Mr. Charles Phillips, when programmes of high-class music were performed. This is the third year that this artistic trio have given recitals in Jersey and Guernsey and they are always much appreciated.

Leamington.—The Choral Union has appropriately decided to open its season, on November 4 (the fiftieth anniversary of the composer's lamented death), with an In Memoriam performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The soloists will be Miss Maggie Purvis, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Charles Phillips, and Mr. Gibbs will conduct.

Lowestoft.—A recital of vocal and instrumental music was given at the Parish Church, on the 16th ult., by Miss S. H. Vaughan (vocalist), Mr. Henry Such (violinist), Mr. Percy Such (violoncellist), and Mr. H. D. Flowers (organist of the church). The recital, which included S. S. Wesley's fine Choral Song and Fugue, the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Violin Concerto, and Hiller's "Lord! whom my inmost soul adoreth," was most successful.

New Brighton.—Some remarkably fine concerts have been given during August and September at the New Brighton Tower Gardens, by the Tower Band of forty performers. Two programmes are specially worthy of notice. The first, on the 10th ult., was devoted entirely to the works of Wagner; and the second, a week later, to the compositions of Sir Alexander Mackenzie. We believe that this is the first time in this country that the works played at these concerts have been attempted by a military band; and Mr. Granville Bantock, the conductor, is to be congratulated upon the success of its efforts, which have been well supported by the Liverpool people.

Portsmouth.—The annual report of the Portsmouth Orchestral Society records steady and encouraging progress. The programme for the coming season contains a varied selection of symphonies (including Beethoven's No. 7 and Sterndale Bennett's seldom played G minor), overtures, pianoforte and violin concertos, and Guilmant's Symphony in D minor for organ and orchestra. Mr. W. E. Churcher is the honorary conductor of the society.

Wigan.—The Choral Society has commenced operations for the coming season with a powerful and well-balanced chorus, under the conductorship of Mr. C. H. Moody. The works to be given are Cowen's "Rose Maiden," "The Messiah," the "Creation," and a selection from "Tannhäuser." The Wigan operatic Society, under the same conductor, will give performances in the Royal Court Theatre in December of the "Bohemian Girl" and the "Colleen Bawn." The Wigan Church Choral Association is rehearsing Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants," and a performance will be given under Mr. Moody, choirmaster of the Association, in Wigan Parish Church, on November 4, the fiftieth anniversary of Mendelssohn's death, with a chorus of 300 voices.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Horace Percival Barton, to Pro-Cathedral, Port Elizabeth, South Africa.—Mr. F. J. Dugard, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of the Ascension, Lavender Hill.—Mr. Harold A. Jeboult, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church of St. Mary Magdalene, Taunton.

Choir Appointment.—Mr. Gilbert Hine, Choirmaster to Emmanuel Church, Harrow Road.

("FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.")

"Likely to be one of the most valuable weapons which has been added to the armoury of the modern teacher during this century."—Sir Frederick Bridge.

RECENT TESTIMONY.

"I play old pieces infinitely better (without practice) than I used to when working at them."—G. P., London.

"I have done no finger studies of any sort since your instructions came, yet I can play ever so much better."—E., Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O.

"Difficulties which were once almost insurmountable now seem to fall to pieces as I play. The keyboard, which once seemed hard and unyielding, has now become like velvet to my fingers."—D. Parkes, Plymouth.

"Was afraid to play a piece in public. Now I have no fear at all. I play no technical exercises."—H., Mus. Bac.

"To me it has been a veritable godsend."—C. S. Parsonson, Mus. Bac.

"You were quite right in assuming that I was in the habit of playing with a limp arm. I have derived wonderful benefit from your hint on this point."—K., Belfast.

"I had decided to send this piece (Czerny's Toccata) with test passages marked, but on playing it to-day I find the difficulties have almost vanished."—C., L.R.A.M.

"My technique has improved wonderfully—nay, almost incredibly . . I never feel the need of them (technical exercises) now; during the last few months I have done nothing of the sort."—C. T. R. Scott, Brussels.

"For lightness of touch I would not take off my hat to anybody. A lady said to me the other day that I must have practised a great deal to procure such a touch, and when I told her I did not practise at all at the keyboard, she looked dumbfounded."—W., F.R.C.O.

"I have found the system of the greatest possible use in teaching the piano, more particularly in the case of adult pupils, to many of whom music is now a delight instead of a toil as formerly. To teachers whose time is so fully occupied that they have no time for practice, Macdonald Smith's system is worth ten times the modest fee which he charges for lessons."—Chas. G. Bryan, Southport.

SIX ACTION SONGS

MARY HUTCHINSON

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

BALLAD

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS BY

RUDYARD KIPLING

FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"Dr. Bridge was well advised in selecting the poem as a text for his Jubilee Song. Good judgment equally appears in the musical treatment. Manifestly a work designed for the purpose here in view should be distinguished by features which recommend it to popular taste and feeling—that is to say, it should be tuneful, rhythmical, and simple. These are precisely the qualities that recommend the work under notice, and they are quite compatible with a large measure of picturesque effect and varied expression. . . . The picturesque poem and its happy setting, so full of spirit and fitness, at once pleased the public. The performance was indeed excellent, making quite justifiable the 'ovation' promptly tendered to the principal singer and the composer-conductor. Dr. Bridge was thrice called to the platform."—Daily Telegraph.

SET TO MUSIC FOR CHORUS (S.A.T.B.), ORCHESTRA, AND ORGAN

BY

EDWARD ELGAR.

THE TIMES.

The composer has recently made remarkable strides in popular estimation, and in his latest work those characteristics of originality, force, and skill which have procured him his position are fully maintained. . . . The whole service is one of remarkable beauty and individuality.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Elgar's new settings of most familiar texts are quite of a festal character, having but little in common with what may be called the traditional, and still orthodox, form and spirit of English Church music. . . . Happy, as I think, in their construction, these pieces are perhaps even more fortunate in the power and value of their expression. The composer is not, as Wagner said of Berlioz, crushed by the ruins of his own machines. They may be more elaborate than is usual in such a case, but they come to no grief, and involve their inventor in none. Every force is directed straight to the end of expression, which shall be appropriate, powerful, and clear. I cannot say that the mark is ever absolutely missed, and I must express an opinion that it is generally hit plumb in the centre. To my mind, indeed, the new works are a succession of effects which more and more absorb attention, and more and more tend to the conviction that one is hearing music in which are some at least of the elements of greatness. . . . Mr. Elgar's new compositions are, of their kind, masterpieces, and such as compel me to await the further development of the Malvern musician's career with augmented confidence.

MORNING POST.

It is a masterly work. The theme which opens the orchestral introduction, and on which the composition may be said to be built, is striking and powerful, and it is subsequently treated in a most skilful and effective manner. The voices are much used in unison against this initial theme given out by the orchestra, but in several places they are written for in four parts, unaccompanied, with beautiful effect. There are also some well-conceived imitatory vocal passages, and now and again the voices are in five and six parts. Great intensity of emotion marks the setting of the intercessory portions of the hymn, and the announcement of the final words is most impressive. . . . The music allied to the Benedictus is naturally more suave and flowing than that written for the Te Deum, but the themes of the latter are cleverly utilised in the former, and with such deft alterations in tempo and treatment that the music finely expresses the spirit of blessing and peace which pervades the text.

STANDARD.

The Te Deum opens with a figure which is used with such persistency that the listener is reminded of the methods of Dvorák. Other themes are, of course, introduced, and the whole feeling of the composition is dramatic, with masterly part-writing for the voices and glowing orchestration. . . . Mr. Elgar's masterly work is equally suitable for the church and the concert-room, and it should be heard in London at the earliest opportunity.

Hymn of Thanksgiving

FOR

THE QUEEN'S LONG REIGN

(1837-1897)

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

CHARLES HARFORD LLOYD.

Price Two Shillings.

String Parts (in the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The work conforms, strictly speaking, to the type of "chorale-cantata," of which Bach left so many glorious examples. Not a German chorale, but a typically English hymn-tune—viz., "Bedford," one of the finest of the eighteenth century tunes—has been taken as the groundwork of the composition, at least as far as concerns the choral portions. . . . This fine hymn or cantata is certain to win a place among festal works to be used at all joyful seasons.

MORNING POST.

The work opens with a suave instrumental introduction, which in its melodious and complacent character indicates the nature of the music which follows. This commences with a choral fugue which is developed with much ingenuity and command of the usual resources of counterpoint. A soprano solo well laid out for the voice follows, and then the tenor soloist gives out the special sentences for the Queen, and is answered in harmony by the choir, accompanied by a melodious figure on the strings, the choir towards the close being divided into eight parts with impressive effect. A duet for soprano and tenor affords a good contrast to the preceding number, and the final chorus comprises an opening and concluding portion in eight parts and a well-written fugue.

STANDARD.

Dr. Lloyd's ability as a writer and a musician generally is too well known to need description, and it may be said without further preface that his latest work is one of conspicuous merit, worthy of performance by either large or small choral societies.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The "Hymn of Thanksgiving" is distinguished for its symmetry of form and melodic charm. Opening with a graceful instrumental introduction for strings, the cantata has for its first number a new choral setting of Tate and Brady's version of the first verse of the 34th Psalm, in which effective use is made of a chorale of the old hymn-tune known as "Bedford." A soprano solo then follows, the concluding section of which is marked by a serenity admirably fitted to the words. To this succeeds a brief litany in which flowing phrases for the tenor solo are answered antiphonally by the male voices of the chorus, the number concluding with a brief but charming unaccompanied choral passage in eight parts. The ensuing duet for soprano and tenor is of a more animated character, and the work concludes with a fine chorus in solid eight-part harmony, leading into a vigorous fugue, and culminating in a chorale in which the tune of "Bedford" is given out by the chorus in unison to a florid orchestral accompaniment, in which the fugue is re-introduced with the happiest results.

BEETHOVEN

AND HIS

NINE SYMPHONIES

BY

GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

Price, cloth, gilt, Six Shillings.

"I recognise it, without the smallest hesitation, as one of the most important and valuable among recent contributions to musical literature. . . . The best informed of professional musicians may learn a great deal about the master-works of Beethoven from Sir George Grove, whose wide reading and acute perceptiveness have enabled him to marshal an astonishing array of facts, and whose intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the master has qualified him to throw light upon pages which, to many, are still obscure. . . . I must be satisfied with the remarks already made, earnestly recommending all who recognise Beethoven's greatness as shown in his immortal Symphonies to obtain Sir George Grove's volume, and walk in the luminous paths through which he is ready to conduct all who trust his guidance."—Daily Telegraph.

THE HISTORY

OF

"ELIJAH"

BY

F. G. EDWARDS.

With an Introduction by SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

And a number of Portraits, including a hitherto unpublished one of the Composer.

"Another work of distinct value to musical historians. . . . The temptation to gossip over the incidents of the first performance has been quite successfully resisted, and the author lets Mendelssohn's own letters tell the story for the most part. . . . There are several portraits of those who took part in the original performance, and one most interesting portrait of Mendelssohn from a drawing in the possession of Mrs. Victor Benecke. The work of compiling the necessary information has been excellently done, and the publication comes as a fitting celebration of the 50th anniversary of the production of the work."—The Times, April 16, 1896.

"Mr. Edwards' book contains, of course, much that is familiar to students of Mendelssohn, and even to the casual readers of musical biography, but the author is able to set forth no little which fairly claims attention as new. There are, for example, various letters from the composer not heretofore made public, and full of interest for those to whom the details of a great work are attractive."—Daily Telegraph, April 15, 1896.

MAGNIFICAT

SET TO MUSIC

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

String Parts (in the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The work is cast for choir with one soloist, a soprano, and is divided into five numbers, in the first and last of which both solo and choir are employed. In both these sections a prominent part is played by a short phrase taken from the plain song associated with the hymn. . . . It is first developed orchestrally in a passage which bears, as it were, the sign-manual of Parry in every bar, and the solo voice enters on an interrupted cadence, followed soon after by the choir in rich four-part polyphony. In addition to the main theme there is a jubilant subject in the dominant, which, in a symphonic movement, would be called the second subject; the chorus is worked upon these two with surpassing skill and effect. The quiet, long-drawn strains of the first solo, "Quia respexit," prepare us for the succeeding chorus, "Et misericordia ejus," a flowing measure in nine-eight time, with a florid violin obbligato part, in which the only approach to conventionality is to be traced in the whole work. The second soprano solo, "Fecit potentiam," reveals the hand of the author of "God breaketh the battle," in "Judith"; it is a worthy companion to that famous solo, and its climax, "Et divites dimisit inanes," gives it a variety and relief which the other may be said to lack. The final section, "Suscepit Israel," begins with a remarkably beautiful passage of six-part vocal harmony, and its climax is provided in a brilliant four-part fugue, "Sicut locutus est," the working of which is a masterpiece of learning, and which is yet so far from pedantry that it strikes the casual hearer as merely a triumphant close to the joyful strains of the hymn.

DAILY NEWS.

There is nothing of the advanced school in Dr. Parry's music to the canticle, which, indeed, more than once recalls the old masters. One phrase in the preliminary symphony, likewise used in the opening solo and chorus, curiously suggests a similar phrase in a Lutheran chorale which Mendelssohn has made popular. It is practically the motto theme of the "Magnificat," for it recurs at the end of the number, and again at the close of the whole work. . . . "And His mercy is on them that fear Him" contains the most beautiful music in the work. Opening with an expressive prelude for orchestra, the voices of the chorus softly enter, accompanied almost throughout by a solo violin; while the close is deeply impressive. "He hath showed strength" is again a soprano solo, almost in the Handelian style, and somewhat recalling in character the tenor solo "God breaketh the battle" in the same composer's "Judith." The rest of the music is for chorus, with a very fine fugue at the words, "As He promised to our forefathers," and a repetition of the Lutheran phrase at the conclusion. . . . This noble example of British art deserves to be heard by the Albert Hall, or another of our "crack" choirs.

CHRONICLE.

It has freedom, breadth, and spontaneity, each section being so vital to the whole that it could not be removed without serious injury to the work. How few are the compositions of our time, whether by British or foreign musicians, of which this can be said. Three of the five numbers into which this latest setting of the canticle is divided are partly or wholly choral, the solo relief being supplied by a soprano. There is an orchestral prelude of an appropriately exultant character which leads directly into the strain of worship, first enunciated by the soprano in a simple and flowing phrase of seven bars, and then taken up by the chorus, the basses leading. A similar course, the effectiveness of which is indisputable, is adopted for the second verse, and an imposing climax is obtained by a repetition of the two verses, by chorus and soloist, the latter having an independent part in the higher register. The next number, "Quia respexit humilitatem" (Dr. Parry has preferred Latin text), is a refined air for soprano only, as also, though in another vein of sentiment, is the "Fecit potentiam." These are separated by a smoothly melodious chorus (andantino espressivo), "Et misericordia," one of the peculiarities of which is the graceful violin solo that runs through the greater portion of the number. For No. 5, "Suscepit Israel puerum suum," Dr. Parry summons all his forces with the best results. . . . Finally, the soloist repeats the first verse, which is, of course, the text of the canticle, and a reiterated "Amen" terminates a work in which Dr. Parry's mastery of strong effects obtained by legitimate and always scholarly means is as patent as ever.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The new Magnificat I take to be one of his finest, as well as his ripest, productions. . . . As usual with Dr. Parry, the music is close woven to an intricate pattern, which is, however, always clear. It marches—there can be no question about that—and takes us with it on the way to an imposing Coda, wherein the church theme comes back with augmented grandeur and effect. I should say that no finer chorus than this has been written for a long time; it delights the ear and exalts the feeling. There is not a bar of padding or commonplace from beginning to end, nor one which seems other than what in the nature of things it should be. This is high praise, and if I knew of words which could make it higher I would use them. . . . No. 3—"Et misericordia"—is a chorus with violin solo, a strain of the most tender and delightful nature, brimful of delight, and adorned by the violin with charmingly decorative passages. The choral writing is unpretentious, but far higher than technical tours de force is the sense of beauty and fitness which the music exhales as a flower its fragrance. It will probably be the favourite section. In the next number we find a second soprano solo of the most vigorous and, one might say, aggressive description, fit to herald the putting down of the mighty from their seats. . . . The final number has a massive opening section in six parts, followed by a capital fugue on a diatonic scale subject, and ending with a Coda in which both the church theme and that of the fugue are introduced. So closes a work which helps to strengthen an impression that there are golden days in store for English music.

STANDARD.

His latest utterance must rank among his best in freshness and musicianship, if not in dimensions. . . . The present setting opens brightly with a figure always heard when the word "Magnificat" is uttered. The jubilant style is continued until the solo voice enters, when for a moment there is more sedate treatment; but the first chorus, which might be termed a free fugue, is cheerfulness itself, and the peroration is unquestionably imposing. A suave and flowing air, "Quia respexit humilitatem," comes next, and is succeeded by a truly delightful chorus in nine-eight measure, "Et misericordia," with a violin solo obbligato. The close, when the violin ascends to A in altissimo, is especially charming. Dr. Hubert Parry has never written anything better than this section of his new work. A brilliant and florid solo, "Fecit potentiam," in the style of the composer's air, "God breaketh the battle," in "Judith," is followed by the last chorus, which consists mainly of a capitally-written fugue, the subject being descending notes of the major scale of F. When the time has arrived for the peroration, the "Magnificat" theme is introduced for the last time, and the work comes to a close in a manner that could scarcely be made more imposing.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

An emphatic success has to be recorded. Laid out for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, Dr. Parry's work is thoroughly characterised by that happy union of strength, science, dignity, and energy which has long been associated with the products of his pen. The central motive of the work is the old plain song phrase which Mendelssohn has utilised in the "Hymn of Praise," and although relief is afforded by the tender soprano solo "Quia respexit," and the suave and melodious chorus "Et misericordia," which is practically a violin solo with choral accompaniments, the work begins and ends in a spirit of exultant gladness. In the second soprano solo it should be noticed that Dr. Parry has reverted to the florid Handelian style, of which he has given us so happy an example in the tenor air in his oratorio of "Judith," and the results here are hardly less exhilarating. Finally we must notice the elaborate but brilliant fugue which brings a fine work to a striking conclusion.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

There is not a page of his score that could ever be called commonplace. . . . I note the finely inspiriting solo and chorus—the second part of the opening movement, "Et exultavit spiritus meus," which is a page of real and genuinely impulsive inspiration. All the choruses, in fact, have some of this spirit, but not all sustained upon so long and beating a flight.

"'Una' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

† THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Ninth and Tenth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

* JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twentieth to Twenty-fifth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

Fifth and Sixth Thousand.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

† ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

A HYMN

Used at the Church Congress, 1896, and Suitable for Dedication Festivals, Church Festivals, &c.

In our day of thanksgiving one psalm let us offer,
For the Saints who before us have found their reward;
When the cords of our love broke asunder, we sorrowed,
But now we rejoice that they rest in the Lord.

In the morning of life, and at noon, and at even,
He called them away from our worship below;
But not till His love, at the Font and the Altar,
Had girt them with grace for the way they should go.

These stones that have echoed their praises are holy,
And dear is the ground where their feet have once trod;
Yet here they confessed they were strangers and pilgrims,
And still they were seeking the City of God.

Sing praise, then, for all who here sought and here found Him,
Whose journey is ended, whose perils are past;
They believed in the Light; and its glory is round them,
Where the clouds of earth's sorrow are lifted at last. Amen.

Copy of testimonial from the late Sir Joseph Barnby shortly before his death: "I have much pleasure in recommending Miss Maude Ballard as an admirable singer, possessed of a very good voice and considerable dramatic talent, who is likely to make a good position in the musical world. She sang Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' at a concert I conducted with the greatest possible success. In fact, she is an admirable musician, and one who could be relied upon, whether on the stage or concert platform.—Joseph Barnby."
"In the absence of Miss Esther Palliser, through illness, her solo, 'Hear ye, Israel,' was undertaken by Miss Maude Ballard, a lady who possesses that extreme rarity, a pure and perfectly trained soprano voice. She received a well-merited encore. Her other solo, 'I will extol Thee' (Costa), was sung very well indeed, the difficult florid passages being executed with ease and brilliancy."—Kensington News.

The principal tenor was Mr. J. Shakespeare Robinson, and a more acceptable or judicious engagement could scarcely have been made. Everything was treated in a truly artistic manner. His registers were remarkable for their strength and purity. The favourite air, 'Cujus Animam,' and his songs in the second part, affording ample scope for his masterly style. SOLO BOYS.

LONDON TRAINING SCHOOL FOR CHORISTERS.

PRESIDENT, MR. ALBERTO RANDEGGER.
PRINCIPAL, MR. JAMES BATES.

Master STANLEY MARCHANT
Master WILLIE GAMMAGE
Master PERCY HALE
Master HERBERT HARDEN
Master WILLIAM McLEAN
Master ALBERT RUSSELL

can be very strongly recommended for all kinds of solo work.

RECENT PRESS NOTICES.

London City Press, Oct. 16, 1897.—"In the solo 'With verdure clad' the exquisite voice, perfect execution, and sympathetic feeling of Master Willie Gammage were beyond all criticism."

Musical News, Oct. 16, 1897.—"The solos (Sullivan's Festival Te Deum) were very beautifully sung by Master William McLean."

Hereford Mercury, Sept. 15, 1897.—"The anthem in the Cathedral, on Sunday last, was Wesley's 'Wilderness,' which was beautifully sung, Master Stanley Marchant's voice in the soprano solos being exceedingly sweet and bell-like."

Folkestone Herald, Aug. 28, 1897.—"The vocal numbers were contributed by three London choristers, and very beautifully did the boys sing. Master Stanley Marchant, who sang 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' is a boy artist, and his notable voice is only equalled by his natural and wonderful expression. Master Percy Hale sang in praiseworthy style 'With verdure clad,' and Master Willie Gammage created a great impression by his artistic rendering of 'Angels ever bright and fair.' The pure voices of the boys blended marvellously well in the duets 'In His hands' (Mendelssohn), 'O lovely peace' (Handel), and the trio from the 'Elijah,' 'Lift thine eyes.'"

Essex County Standard, Aug. 23.—"The singing of Masters Albert Russell and Willie Gammage was most enchanting."

Essex Telegraph, Aug. 7, 1897.—"Master Stanley Marchant has a full mellow voice, and sings with delightful life and expression, every word being beautifully pronounced; and Master Gammage is also a vocalist in whom the powers of culture and finish seem almost marvellous for one so young."

RECENT TESTIMONIALS.

"Having engaged Master Stanley Marchant on many occasions, I am happy to bear testimony to the sweetness of his voice and the charm of his sympathetic singing."—WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, Principal, Guildhall School of Music, May 20, 1897.

"The Duchess of Albany was delighted with the singing of Master Willie Gammage, and his manners to H.R.H. were simple, unaffected, and courteous."—(Signed) Hon. RICHARD MORECOMBE, April 9, 1897.

"Your boys are excellent."—Sir FREDERICK BRIDGE, Conductor, Royal Choral Society, June 30, 1896.

"I have often been charmed with the sensibility, the phrasing, and the emotional power of your solo boys' renderings."—JOHN SPENCER CURWEN, Esq., President, Tonic Sol-fa College, Sept. 11, 1896.

"I have the pleasure to inform you that your boys gave us very great satisfaction by their artistic singing. We shall hope to have them again."—H. W. SANGSTER, Esq., Mus. Doc., St. Saviour's, Eastbourne, Sept. 7, 1897.

"I thank you very much for the boys' (Masters Hale and Marchant) most valuable help."—G. ROBERTSON SINCLAIR, Esq., Hereford Cathedral, Oct. 10, 1897.

The sixty Chorus Boys who have been so brilliantly successful at the Queen's Hall Oratorio Concerts, conducted by Mr. Randegger, are available for engagements.

The principal London critiques on the Boys' singing at the Queen's Hall Oratorio Concerts:—

The Times, Jan. 4, 1897.—"The choir, materially assisted by a contingent of boys from the London Training School for Choristers, were more than admirable in every way, their quality of tone, power of expression, and precision of attack being as remarkable as they are uncommon."

Daily Telegraph, Jan. 24, 1896.—"The choruses gained in effect through the strengthening of the choir by a contingent of boys from the 'London Training School for Choristers,' whose bright young voices were heard to much advantage."

Morning Post, April 4, 1896.—"In speaking of the choir mention should be made of the excellent singing of the contingent of boys from the London Training School for Choristers."

Standard, Feb. 24, 1896.—"The sopranos and contraltos were reinforced by a large contingent of boys from the London Training School for Choristers. The bright, fresh voices of the juvenile singers blended excellently with those of the female executants."

IN

PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

This book is the result of an endeavour to set down my ideas in a systematic form, and I put it forth in the hope that it may prove of service to some of my fellow-teachers, as likewise to any earnest student of the pianoforte who may be led by his interest in the subject to read what I have written.

PREFACE.

The words of these Four-and-Twenty little Songs have been selected from Mr. Norman Gale's delightful volume of Children's Poems. A few modifications of the original text have been made in order to facilitate their musical rendering.

Though in the first instance, no doubt, the songs will be mainly sung to children rather than by them, the Composer's aim has been to observe such conditions in his settings as to make it easy for children to join in singing them themselves. With this object he has endeavoured to furnish simple, rhythmical melodies of a suitable compass, and it will be found that in the case of sixteen out of the twenty-four songs the vocal range is confined to the octave, whilst in only three instances does it exceed nine notes.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

NOVEMBER 1, 1897.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

Died November 4, 1847.

Fifty years have passed away since the earthly career of Felix Mendelssohn was brought to a close. It is difficult to realise that he was born in the same year as Tennyson—who died only five years ago—and Mr. Gladstone. Moreover, Verdi, "the grand old man" of music, came into the world only four years after Mendelssohn. "Heaven gives its favourites early death," says Byron, and amongst musicians thus prematurely, as we think, garnered by the great Reaper are the names of Schubert, at the age of thirty-one; Mozart, at thirty-five; Purcell, at thirty-seven; Mendelssohn, at thirty-eight; and Weber, at forty. It is of course impossible to say what "Felix Meritis," as Schumann felicitously named his friend Mendelssohn, might have accomplished had he been permitted to reach even the Psalmist's limit of human life. But it may not be without interest to record the terrible blanks which would have existed in the realm of music had Bach, Handel, Beethoven, or Wagner died at the same age as Mendelssohn — viz., thirty-eight years. If these great masters of music had shared the fate of Mendelssohn's premature death, we should have been deprived of the following colossal works, which the subjoined table clearly shows:

Bach.	Handel.
"St. John" and "St. Matthew" Passions.	"The Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," and, in fact, all his oratorios, except "Esther."
B minor Mass.
Part II. of the "Forty-eight."
Beethoven.	Wagner.
Symphonies 7, 8, and 9 ("The Choral").	"Meistersinger."
	"Tristan und Isolde."
Mass in D.	"Nibelungen Ring."
Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.	"Parsifal."

So much has been written upon the subject of Mendelssohn that it is somewhat difficult to find fresh matter. But as this In Memoriam article occupies the place of those biographical sketches of living men which during the last few months have appeared in this journal, we have ventured to gather together a few, perhaps not uninteresting, incidents relating to Mendelssohn, more especially in regard to his visits to England, a country, as well as its people, he loved with a deep and true affection.

He was only twenty when, in 1829, he first set foot upon our shores. The chief musical journal of the time, the Harmonicon, under date April 26, 1829, said: "Another arrival in London is the young M. Mendelssohn (Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy), son of the rich banker of Berlin, and, I believe, grandson of the celebrated Jewish philosopher and elegant writer. He is one of the finest pianoforte players in Europe, and, though a very young man, is supposed to be better acquainted with music than most professors of the art." Strangely enough, Mendelssohn reached London in a steamer named the Attwood, and one of his earliest and dearest English friends was Thomas Attwood, organist of St Paul's Cathedral—"dear old Mr. Attwood," as the young musician affectionately called him. Attwood was the pupil of Mozart, and it is most interesting that on English soil and in the person of an English musician we find the link which connected Mozart with Mendelssohn. How eagerly Mendelssohn must have listened to Attwood's stories of Mozart, when the former stayed with the old organist at his villa on Beulah Hill, Norwood! And how he must have enjoyed his visits to the organ-loft at St. Paul's, where he played Handel's Coronation Anthems as duets with his genial host, and there gained a knowledge of our cathedral music. It was to Attwood that Mendelssohn dedicated his three Organ Preludes and Fugues (Op. 37). The title-page of the original German edition states that they were dedicated to Attwood "with reverence and gratitude" (mit Verehrung und Dankbarkeit), which addition to the dedication has, we are glad to say, been recently added to Messrs. Novello's English edition of the work.

Another early friend—the friend of everyone with whom he came into contact—was Vincent Novello. It was through Mendelssohn's friendship with Novello that Bach's small E minor Prelude and Fugue for the organ was published in England before it was printed in Germany, a fact of which we may well be proud. Here is a letter, hitherto unpublished, written by Mendelssohn in his own capital English—for the style of which he had not the slightest occasion to apologise—to Vincent Novello, and addressed to him at "67, Frith Street, Soho, London":

My dear Sir,—I have to beg your pardon that the first letter I write to you is to be a letter of business; but if it was not for that I should not venture to give you the trouble of reading so bad an English as mine. I do not try to repeat to you the thanks for all your kindnesses because I am not able to express it as I wish to do and as I feel it.

I want to-day to ask you whether you still remember your writing to me once that you wished me to compose an evening and morning service for publication in your country? I could not then fix the time when I was to do it, as it was the first thing in that style I was to compose; but as soon as I got quiet here I tried to begin the Te Deum in the style of your cathedral music and it is now finished. Although it is not entirely as I wish it to be and though I hope the following pieces will be better, I do not think it unworth being published, and I accordingly want to ask you whether you are still of the opinion, which you expressed then to me in your kind note, and whether I am to go on with the composition of the services and to send it to you, when it is finished. You asked me also for my terms; but I am really at a loss to fix them, as I never published any composition of the kind in your country; you would oblige me particularly if you would tell me your opinion on this subject; or if you do not like this, let me know how you use to pay other composers in that style, that I may fix my terms accordingly.

I hope if you answer to this you will write me at large how you are and how your family is going on. I want to know which painting your son is working at, what progresses the charming talent of your daughter has made, pray let me know every thing that concerns you and your family. It is now so long, since I did not hear from you, and you know how glad I shall be to have news of you and all my friends there. I have still to thank you for the kindness you showed me in having my pianoforte-melodies sold at your house; I think they must now be published already, and am exceedingly obliged to you for your kind and friendly behaviour. Adieu, my dear Sir, excuse this letter and let me soon hear a great deal from you.—Believe me to remain, yours very truly,

Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Berlin, Aug. 22d, 1832.

The reference in the above letter to the "pianoforte-melodies" is to the "Songs without words," and which, under the former title, were first published by Mr. J. Alfred Novello, owing to his father's "kind and friendly behaviour" towards Mendelssohn. The original title of Book I. of the now familiar work was as follows:—

Original | Melodies | for the | Piano Forte | composed | by | Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. | London | Published (for the author) by T. (sic) A. Novello, 67, Frith Str^t, Soho Sq^e | Ent. Sta. Hall. | Pr. 4/-.|

Strange as it seems to us now, the composition was published "for the author," the publisher apparently not being willing to take the risk! The earliest copies were signed "I. M. for M. B."—i.e., Moscheles for Mendelssohn. The sale in England was very slow at first. A reference to the books of Messrs. Novello and Co. shows that only 114 copies were sold in the first four years! The year after the work was first issued (Entered at Stationers' Hall, August 20, 1832) Mendelssohn was again in England, when he wrote to Moscheles, under date "London, in my club, May 16, 1833," requesting his advice as to whether he should venture to ask Novello if he had any money to give him from the proceeds of the sale of his "Original Melodies." It was in this connection that Mendelssohn committed, according to some "superior" people, the heinous offence of making a pun—but it was a very good one, especially for a foreigner. Mendelssohn writes: "If he [Novello] has only sixpence to give me as my share, I would rather not broach the subject. . . . . The saying is: 'Merit has its crown,' so I scarcely expect I shall get as much as half-a-crown!"

Mr. John Callcott Horsley, R.A., now an octogenarian, the son of William Horsley, the eminent glee composer, and grandson of Dr. Callcott, delights to recall the incidents of his friendship with Mendelssohn and the many visits paid to the old house, still the residence of the family, at Kensington. One evening they performed an opera entitled "The Magician," the music of which was composed by the late Miss Sophy Horsley, then a girl of about fourteen, and in which each performer wrote his (or her) own dialogue! At the representation Mendelssohn was in fits of laughter, which he attempted to hide by crouching down behind the family couch, which formed the "stalls" on that memorable evening.

Mendelssohn's friendship with Sterndale Bennett and championship of his music is too well known to be referred to here. The late Sir George Macfarren has thus recorded, in a felicitous little note, addressed to the home circle, his first meeting with Mendelssohn: "Dear Everybody, — Mendelssohn behaved to me like an Angel. G. A. M., June 27, 1842." Mr. H. C. Banister, in his interesting "Life" of Macfarren, from which we have taken the foregoing, records an amusing instance of Mendelssohn's hatred of pedantic discussion of theoretical matters. Macfarren was most anxious to enlist Mendelssohn under the banner of Dr. Day in his theoretical campaign. A meeting was arranged at Macfarren's house in Berners Street; "but," as Mr. Banister records, "before Dr. Day had proceeded far with his argumentative exposition, the face of Mendelssohn assumed an expression so suggestive of his having taken a dose of nauseous medicine, that, in order to avoid a 'scene,' Macfarren was compelled to bring the discussion to an abrupt, if not untimely, end." There is a story current of Mendelssohn to the effect that someone once asked him to give the root of the first chord of his Wedding March, to which he replied that he didn't know and he didn't care: he liked it.

Mendelssohn at once made his mark in England as a conductor at the Philharmonic concert of May 25, 1829. The baton was not then used in England, and, as Mendelssohn had not brought one with him, he had to have one specially made for the occasion. "The maker of the white stick," says Mendelssohn, "took me for an Alderman and would insist on decorating it [at the tip] with a crown."

Mendelssohn showed his gratitude to and appreciation of the Philharmonic Society by presenting it with the MS. score of his "Hebrides" Overture, which is doubtless one of the most precious possessions of that venerable Society. Here is the letter (Brit. Museum Add. MSS. 33,965, f. 251) written from Attwood's villa and addressed to "Sir George Smart, 91, Great Portland Street," which accompanied the gift:

Norwood, Surrey, June 6, 1823.

My dear Sir,—The treat which I owe to the Philharmonic Society during my residence in England this season, and the kindness I met with at their concerts, calls forth my sincerest thanks. May I ask you to offer to the Society the score of my overture to the "Isles of Fingal," as a sign of my deep and heartfelt gratitude for the indulgence and kindness they have shown me during my second stay in this country.—Believe me to remain, my dear Sir,

Very truly yrs.,
Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Mendelssohn's organ-playing was a source of the greatest attraction to English organists. He was the first to introduce some of Bach's great organ fugues, which he played so well, to the notice of our players. Miss Elizabeth Mounsey—whose organ-playing Mendelssohn recollected "with so much pleasure"—vividly recalls his organ performances in 1840 and 1842 at St. Peter's, Cornhill, where for nearly fifty years she was organist. A memento of his first visit, together with the old keyboards on which he played and the draw-stop jambs, are preserved in the vestry of the church. On the second occasion, a Sunday morning in June, he suddenly appeared in the organ-loft while Miss Mounsey was accompanying the dismission hymn, sung to Haydn's tune "Austria." He laughingly said to her: "Ah! you would not play to me the last time I came, but you are obliged to now." He then took his seat at the instrument—one of the earliest in England to have the German (CC) compass—and played a magnificent extemporaneous fantasia, ending with a fugue on the tune which the congregation had just sung. Miss Mounsey, who is an excellent musician, bears personal testimony to Mendelssohn's extraordinary powers in working out a theme. It was not a mere dry academic piece of work, smelling of the lamp, but was enriched by a fanciful beauty as remarkable as its wonderful spontaneity. It should be remembered that Mendelssohn composed his organ sonatas on the initiative of some English organists.

No less remarkable was his pianoforte playing, especially of Beethoven. He played the Pianoforte Concerto in G—"my old cheval de bataille," as he called it—at the Philharmonic in 1844 and 1847. On the first occasion he had not seen the music for two or three years and failed to obtain a copy to look it over in time for the Saturday rehearsal; but he played it from memory. At the rehearsal he introduced three different cadenzas in the first movement, each time extempore, to the astonishment of the many musicians who were present. But still more wonderful, he played an entirely different one—a fourth—at the concert on the following Monday night.

Not very much has been recorded of Mendelssohn's viola playing, doubtless because of its private nature. At the house of Mr. Alsager, of the Times, in Queen Square, he used to play the viola in his Quintet in A (Op. 18), having as his colleague the late Mr. J. H. B. Dando, who communicated to the present writer the following affectionate tribute to the composer: "When dear Mendelssohn," writes Mr. Dando, "played tenor with me, I used to play first tenor; but if difficulties arose which he thought I could execute better, he used quietly to change the books, and I knew my duty. It was always so. He knew quite well how I loved him and his music."

At a musical party given by Dr. Billing, a practitioner well known in musical circles, Mendelssohn once played in concerted music with Paganini. The event is recorded in the Morning Post of May 16, 1833:—

Paganini.—It has been frequently said that this extraordinary performer could not take part in a quartet with any effect. This is far from being correct. At a soirée given by Dr. Billing, the other evening, Paganini, Mendelssohn, and Lindley performed a trio for viola, guitar, and violoncello (composed by Paganini), Mendelssohn playing the guitar part on the pianoforte, adding a bass in the most ingenious manner. Paganini's performance on the tenor was of the true school; there were no tricks, no jumping and skipping, but all the passages were legitimately and beautifully played, as were those given to the violoncello by Lindley. As a composition it reflected credit on the Signor; it was well conceived, scientifically written, and remarkably pleasing and effective.

It is doubtful if even Sir George Grove in his exhaustive and interesting article on Mendelssohn in the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" has recorded that Mendelssohn appeared in public as an orchestral performer. Yet such was the case at Moscheles' concert, given in London, June 1, 1832, his instrument being the big drum. The Morning Post, in a notice of the concert, said: "When Moscheles was playing his 'The Fall of Paris,' Mendelssohn beat a bass-drum part in the orchestra, which, with a pair of cymbals, added greatly to the effect of the performance."

The late Mr. Surman records that at the Birmingham Festival of 1840 Mendelssohn looked over his book and joined heartily in singing the tenor part of Handel's chorus "We never will bow down." He detected a wrong note in the copy, which, taking out his pencil, he corrected. He also took part in singing two other Handel choruses, and at the conclusion said to Surman: "Ah! this man puts the extinguisher on us all."

Mendelssohn read Dickens, whom he once met in London. Mr. Arthur O'Leary remembers that when he entered the Leipzig Conservatorium (in 1847) Mendelssohn offered to lend him the "Pickwick Papers." Taking the volume down from his bookcase, he said to young O'Leary: "You must take great care of this copy, as it was given to me by my mother." In this connection Miss Sabilla Novello writes from Genoa: "I remember Mendelssohn sitting down by me on one occasion and, knowing that I was conversant with German, asking me in his lisping manner —'What ith a thtump?' This somewhat peculiar word I translated into German for him. He then told me that he had been reading Dickens, and found the words 'Magpie and Stump' rather difficult to understand, so I explained to him that they were the sign of a certain well-known inn." Here is the Pickwickian "stump" passage over which Mendelssohn stumbled:

When we add, that a weather-beaten sign-board bore the half-obliterated semblance of a magpie intently eyeing a crooked streak of brown paint, which the neighbours had been taught from infancy to consider as the "stump," we have said all that need be said, of the exterior of the edifice.—("Pickwick Papers," Chap. xx.)

In our issue for June we gave an account of Mendelssohn's visit to the Queen in 1842. During his last sojourn in England, in 1847, he was again received at Buckingham Palace by the Queen and the Prince Consort. A characteristic incident of the Queen's motherliness is thus recorded by Moscheles:

The Queen had received him very graciously, and he was much pleased with her rendering of some of his songs, which he had accompanied; he had also played to the Queen and the Prince. She must have been pleased, for, when he rose to depart, she thanked him, and said, "You have given me so much pleasure, now what can I do to give you pleasure?" Mendelssohn deprecating, she insisted; so he candidly admitted that he had a wish that only her Majesty could fulfil. He, himself the head of a household, felt mightily interested in the Queen's domestic arrangements; in short, might he see the Royal children in their Royal nurseries? The Queen at once entered into the spirit of his request, and in her most winning way conducted him herself through the nurseries, all the while comparing notes with him on the homely subjects which had a special attraction for both.

The news of Mendelssohn's death came as a terrible shock to his many friends in England, where half-a-century ago he was greatly beloved both for his personal charm and his artistic life. Here are extracts from two letters to the late Mr. Bartholomew from Mendelssohn's attached English friends, Carl Klingemann and John Hullah, written soon after the death of the composer of "Elijah." Klingemann wrote: "Many thanks for your kind letter. We all deeply lament our common irreparable loss, and shall not see his like again."

John Hullah wrote: "How little we could either of us have thought, at the time of our last interview, that at our next we should speak of the beautiful genius and a most sweet character that had brought us together, as a thing of the past. Happily for the world, Mendelssohn's was not a youth of mere promise: happily for himself, it was accompanied by a novel existence, clear and exemplary as his artistic life was *in*imitable."

The concluding words of this article on Mendelssohn may appropriately bear reference to him as an artist. As Sir George Grove says: "Drawing with him was more like a professional avocation than an amusement. . . . Every little cottage or gate is put in with as much care as the main features. Every tree has its character. Everything stands well on its legs, and the whole has that architectonic style which is so characteristic of his music." We are greatly indebted to Mendelssohn's friend, Mr. J. C. Horsley, R.A., not only for lending, but for generously offering to place at our disposal two charming water-colour sketches by Mendelssohn. These we propose to reproduce, in colours, as a special Supplement in our December issue. Every pains will be taken to reproduce faithfully the minutest detail of design and colour of Mendelssohn's delicate workmanship. We feel sure that our readers will be glad to possess these interesting mementoes of the composer of "Elijah," evincing as they do his remarkable proficiency in the sister art to music.

The small portraits of Felix and his sister Fanny in the present number are from photographs of miniatures taken in Paris in 1816, kindly supplied by Sir George Grove. The portrait of Mendelssohn, which forms the Supplement, was drawn from life during his visit to England in 1833 by Mr. Edward Petre Novello, to whom we specially refer in another column.

THE DONIZETTI CENTENARY.

Not quite a hundred years have passed since Gaetano Donizetti was born. That event took place on November 29, 1797, but the people of his native town did not wait for the completion of the century. They recently held high festival in commemoration, and rejoiced exceedingly, though with some muddling of details, in the fame of their illustrious co-citizen; none the less because he was born, according to his own account, "underground in Borgo Canale; you had to go down by the cellar stairs, where no light ever penetrated." It has been asked by men whose sympathies are not expansive, "Why celebrate Donizetti?" The question might profitably be put to Joseph Joachim, Alfredo Piatti, and other great artists of conviction strong enough to make them travel many miles to do the very thing queried. They probably cannot understand the condition of mind which refuses to Donizetti the homage due to a great master of melody—to one whose feelings found expression in what strikes us, when we hear it, as song not less spontaneous than that of the lark. Surely, the symphonic orchestra is not exclusively the composer's means of utterance! Donizetti, well says a recent writer, "was born with a sense of beauty in his soul which came to the surface and was given to the world under the form of melody—not melody as it is understood by some latter-day prophets, broken, rent and twisted into every conceivable shape in order that its inventor may extort from it some real or fancied dramatic or descriptive meaning, but melody with form, with a beginning and an end, with phrases long enough and lovely enough to capture and enslave the listener's senses."

But was Donizetti nothing more than a melodist—a song bird who warbled artlessly because he could not help it? The question is absurd in the ears of all who remember the sextet in "Lucia," the closing act of the "Favorita," the trio in "Lucrezia Borgia," and many another masterpiece of dramatic expression in music. Granted that the Italian composer might have written differently had he not been Italian and had he lived at a later time; but it is no offence to be true to your country's art and to your own era. So true was Donizetti, and there were moments when, as though by a divine impulse, he seemed to embody the muse of Italy as did the Pythian priestess the spirit of Apollo.

With singing almost a lost art on the lyric stage, it is not surprising that we now hear little of Donizetti's operas. The great melodist could sing himself, and wrote for those who had the same power. "Donizetti," says Madame Marchesi, who is an authority on the matter, "sang with much taste, and made a special study of the mechanism of the voice. He wrote a work on this subject, which he dedicated to the French Institute. This is why the rôles of his numerous operas are, without exception, well laid out for the different voices. At a time when men are so carried away by the splendours of instrumentation as completely to neglect vocal melody, it is necessary to remember what has been the influence of singing upon musical art." For a time, at least, recollection is all that is left to us, unless, indeed, we upbraid the Muses with William Blake and say:

> How have you left the antient love
> That bards of old enjoyed in you!
> The languid strings do scarcely move;
> The sound is forced, the notes are few.

Let it freely be admitted that Donizetti was very unequal. How could it be otherwise with a man so constituted, so environed, and who did so much? His life was drained from him, at first slowly, then rapidly, till he died a pitiable victim of paralysis. But through all he went on writing, as a man needs must who will leave sixty-four operas behind him. And much that he produced was, no doubt, unworthy of the genius which inspired his masterpieces. He nodded often, but even Homer nodded sometimes. What would you have?

Are we, amid popular (and not always intelligent) admiration of another style, to "think foul scorn" of the Italian melodists—of those who moved the world with simple tune? There is no necessity, divine or human, for any such course. Nay, happy is the man who can discern the good in all its forms, and be touched by the exquisite plaint of "Spirto gentil" hardly less than by the fiercely pulsing passion of Isolde's death. There was much significance in the presence, at the Bergamo fêtes, of some among the greatest artists of the day—men and women unconnected with opera, but able to discern the fair beauty of the Italian composer's strains, and to deem him worthy of such tribute as their skill could offer. All honour to the generous breadth of their admiration, bestowed, not as a dole of charity, but as homage due. The act may be remembered when, in time to come, the world will turn to its melodists as to those who are nearest the gods.

VICTORIAN MUSIC.

Orchestral Music.—III.

In continuing this part of my story down to the present day, I confess to elation of spirit. It is as though a farmer, inspecting his growing crops, came upon a field of abundant promise—a field, it may be, not altogether free from weeds, yet in the main healthy, strong, and comforting to the interested observer. Nothing in the musical history of England is so remarkable as the present rage for orchestral music. This phenomenon—if a much abused word may be permitted—appears to me startling in its suddenness. As a rule, public taste for anything in art has a small beginning and grows very slowly through the stages of intelligent acceptance; even more slowly, sometimes, when it reaches the unintelligently imitative. Prejudice has to be cleared away; inertia to be overcome; power stimulated and directed. In the case we are considering, these operations have been performed in a surprisingly short time, and the reasons for such unusual accelleration are worth finding out.

Seeing the multitude pleased with a thing, we must search, in explanation, for points of sympathy, and here it becomes necessary to discriminate between varieties of the thing itself. If the reader will take the trouble to consider a moment, he will recognise the fact that popular orchestral music is mainly that of recent date. The public are not enthusiastic when they hear Mozart's Overture to the "Magic Flute," or a Suite of Bach, or, indeed, any example of classic as distinct from romantic art. They may listen respectfully—which, as far as it goes, is a good sign—but they are not moved. If, therefore, it be conceived that the progress of orchestral music stopped at Mozart, we should reasonably expect that increase in the favour shown to it would be limited to the degree of growth made by intellectual culture and appreciation. That growth, albeit it goes steadily on, accounts only in slight measure for the present state of orchestral music, and we must seek for some simpler and more easily felt rapport. The trouble involved in search and discovery is but slight. Wagner has been declared the favourite composer of the unmusical, and there is some truth in a personal remark which by no means expresses the whole truth. Certain it is that modern composers, Wagner among them, have captured the unmusical, for much the same reason as a tinted Venus in a gallery of sculpture would draw a greater crowd of admirers than one of unstained marble. The cause may undoubtedly be found in the strong appeal which modern orchestral music makes to sense—the appeal of its sonority, its rich colouring, its alternating languor and passion, its stimulating effects of surprise. Observe that these things are more the trappings of art than art itself, which remains in essence what it was, and is indeed unchangeable. A musical organisation and high culture are not necessary to their enjoyment; thousands who possess neither thrill with pleasure as the waves of sound beat upon sensitive nerves. Setting aside whatever may be its real artistic value, which only a trained and cultivated judgment can determine, modern orchestral music unquestionably provides a sensuous feast for the multitude, who, as we see every day, are eager to enter in and enjoy it. I am not now concerned to discuss the question whether this particular development is healthy or deleterious, though much might be said about it. The point is that the merely sensuous qualities of the modern orchestra are connected as a cause with the effect I set out to discuss. If this be disputed, I ask why it is that concert programmes are crowded with the most exciting compositions that can be found, while other works, of a hundred times their artistic value, are rejected as limp and feeble.

The character of modern music, however, does not stand alone in causal relationship to the popularity of the orchestra. The rise and progress of the modern conductor have had much to do with it; partly in a way which must be recognised as powerful for good; partly for reasons to be looked upon perhaps as more amusing than profitable. It is a curious fact that the average amateur finds little pleasure in music which he cannot associate with a personality. Just as he prefers orchestral compositions that illustrate situations or events, so he desires to receive abstract music through an individual, who shall be to him its visible embodiment. "Invisible music," as it was called, has been tried, but I doubt whether anybody went twice to hear it. This craving for embodiment of the abstract is an attribute of humanity. The ancient Greeks tried to satisfy it when they crowded nature with gods, and he is distantly akin to them who wants to behold a singer as well as listen to him. It long remained the misfortune of orchestral music that no individual was popularly regarded as representing it. There were, of course, sixty or seventy performers, and there were a dozen men in the box of Gilbert's "Trial by Jury." But when the dozen addressed the plaintiff, saying or singing, "We love you fondly and would make you ours," the maiden offered no reply. Twelve men could not embody a single love, and an audience cannot worship seventy. True, there has always been a conductor; but only of late years have the public taken him seriously. He was assumed to be necessary, but he wore no halo. Nobody ever canonised him. I never heard even the most gushing girl exclaim, "O that adorable Costa!" or say that she was going to "hear" W. G. Cusins. The conductor stood conspicuous as part of the furnishing of an orchestra, but he embodied the spirit of the music no more than did his principal first violin. How much have we changed all that!

Sooth to say, none of us suspected what a revolution was impending when Hans Richter accepted an English engagement. We recognised in him no portent as he first stepped upon a London platform, but he was, nevertheless, a very god out of the machine—the heroic embodiment which our public had not been looking for, but which after a time they recognised. Here was an object of popular interest in orchestral performances. The seventy, including the principal first violin, were now less than nothing; the conductor became all in all. We had something to watch as the work went on—a real man, from whose actions, consciously to ourselves, sprang the pleadings and protests of the music; at whose behests the orchestra spoke in thunder or lulled itself to sleep. There was even danger of his eclipsing the composer, whom, it is true, we sometimes forgot, for the disembodied have little chance against form and flesh.

It would be absurd to deny that behind all this admiration lie some good and solid reasons. The case is not wholly one of mere hero-worship, for the typical modern conductor must possess no common capacity. We are sometimes tempted, perhaps, to compare him favourably with his predecessor of a bye-gone generation; and who shall say that he is not an improvement upon the past? In fairness, however, let us consider to what extent modern music affords opportunities for the display of a conductor's individuality. The orchestral music of our own time is many-sided, complicated, capable of varied effects and different "readings" without being in any special degree strained or otherwise abused. In this lies the conductor's chance of personal distinction—one enjoyed by his forerunners only in slight degree. They had a comparatively simple, almost mechanical task, and were restricted in the performance of it by a more imperative law of reverence and more binding traditions than any now existing. It is, in point of fact, modern music that has developed the modern conductor, and in that development we see illustrated the common law of preservation, in virtue of which nature adapts herself to changed conditions.

The effect of present circumstances upon the conductor is not in all respects healthy, since they expose him to powerful temptations. These, however, are not new in kind. All artists are ever in danger of sacrificing sincerity to vanity. "Sincerity," says a great English divine, "is to speak as we think, to do as we pretend and profess, to perform and make good what we promise, and really to be what we would seem and appear to be." It is, therefore, a rare virtue, and those are in particular danger of losing it whose work is done in the eye of the public (of whom a majority cannot well discriminate between the true and the false), and whose instant reward is public applause, than which nothing more readily falls to trick and device. A conductor is much to be congratulated who preserves his virtue unsullied under such conditions; who refuses to make the angels weep by deeds for which men would crown him, and who, like Hans Richter, is ready to efface himself if thereby his art can be made all in all. Some pass the ordeal scatheless; others do not, and are condemned as charlatans by whosoever can see through a flimsy and tawdry disguise.

It may be I have shown that the popularity of orchestral music does not rest entirely upon the best and surest foundations; that it is not wholly a result of increased culture and perceptiveness of the artistically true and good. According to the measure in which this may rightly be said our satisfaction with the present state of things must abate. But there is much for which to be thankful. A great point is gained on behalf of any art when the multitude are induced to take any kind or degree of interest therein. They may be but outer court worshippers, faintly catching the sound of "service high and anthem clear," but it is something to have them there at all. We see a chance, at any rate, that they will draw nearer and even become sharers in the mysteries. For important reasons, therefore, amateurs are entitled to look upon the state of orchestral music in these later Victorian days with considerable satisfaction. While some branches of the art have remained stationary, and one—the opera—has actually gone back, this has made substantial progress. Let us hope that the still spreading and deepening enthusiasm of the public may be rightly guided. Their ear has been won; the next thing is to cultivate it to the appreciation of those higher examples of art which do not depend upon any form of the unworthiness known as "sensationalism"; which are less an appeal to the nerves than to the responsiveness of mind and soul; which elevate and refine rather than call up thrills of physical excitement. That is the true art, and to its pastures may the course of orchestral music lead an ever-increasing flock.

MUSICAL SINCERITY.

Turning over the pages of Sir Charles Hallé's autobiography, the other day, we came across a curious passage relating to his early experiences in London in 1848. He relates how he brought with him letters of introduction to various interesting and eminent people. One was to Lord Brougham, who received Mr. Hallé very kindly, "but candidly told me that music was not at all in his line." Another was to Mr. Richard Cobden, who said with equal candour that he had never been able to distinguish "'God save the Queen' from any other tune." Here we may parenthetically observe that it is related of another eminent personage who was absolutely destitute of a musical ear that he only knew two tunes; one was "God save the Queen" and the other wasn't, and the way he knew the first was that everybody stood up! Hallé's third letter was to the Chevalier de Bunsen, who had the reputation of being a great lover of music. And yet it was in De Bunsen's house that he was subjected to one of the strangest experiences of his life. He was asked to play at a reception, and sat down amid a babel of voices that continued during the performance. The sequel had best be told in his own words: "The thanks of the Chevalier seemed a cruel mockery; still, when later on in the evening he asked me to play again, he was so amiable that out of deference to him I did so; but being unable at the moment to recollect a shorter piece than the one I had played half-an-hour before, I repeated it, and neither the Chevalier nor anybody else detected the identity!"

No doubt musical taste has developed in the last fifty years, but along with the growth of a genuine interest in music there has sprung up a good deal of fictitious and insincere enthusiasm on the part of people who really belong to the category of Lord Brougham and Mr. Richard Cobden. Nowadays it really demands a good deal of moral courage to admit that one does not care about music. We doubt, for example, whether any literary man of to-day would dare to emulate the heroical confession of Charles Lamb. And yet, when the matter is dispassionately considered, how infinitely preferable is such a confession than a parade of fictitious interest which nine times out of ten is discounted by some ludicrous solecism! We are very far from contending that if a man hath not music in his soul he should therefore in season and out of season be continually proclaiming his deficiency in this regard. There are many occasions when courtesy and good manners may dictate the observance of a judicious reticence. On the other hand, it often happens that some declaration of faith is inevitable, and here it is that the temptation to gain credit for a non-existent appreciativeness proves so irresistible to the modern man and woman. To put it briefly, civilisation is incompatible with sincerity. Everybody nowadays must affect an encyclopædic range of sympathy where art and letters are concerned, or labour under the imputation of Philistinism.

Musical insincerity is either positive or negative. That is to say, it either takes the form of simulated admiration or fictitious disapproval. The latter variety is very much in vogue at the moment, and the favourite direction which it takes is disparagement, and even abuse, of Handel and Mendelssohn. We do not for a moment deny that this attitude may, in certain cases, be perfectly genuine. It is undoubtedly professed by some really accomplished and learned musicians, and it is also natural and appropriate in those thorough-paced decadents to whom simplicity, symmetry and coherence are as the abomination of desolation. To paraphrase Macaulay's summary of Barère's character, we like their invectives against Handel and Mendelssohn better than anything else they have written, and dwell on them not merely with complacency, but with a feeling akin to gratitude. In short, the one small service which they can render these great masters is to hate them. If it be true that the greatest tribute to excellence is laudari a laudato, the converse of the Latin phrase is no less a compliment to merit. This, however, is an attitude quite distinct from the affectation of dislike assumed by individuals who have really no opinions of their own, but borrow the eccentricities of others merely in order to attract attention and pose as the hierophants of the new culture. There is no finality or fixity about their dislikes. They are reversible at the shortest notice; the scapegoat of yesterday may become the idol of to-morrow, and vice versâ. Only let one of their apostles declare that Beethoven is brutal and Wagner vulgar and they will subscribe to the doctrine with the utmost fervour.

If, however, the affectation of disdain and dislike is the most objectionable form of musical insincerity, simulated enthusiasm is much more frequently encountered. It may be urged in extenuation of the offence that it does not endanger the peace or well-being of the community at large, or, in other words, that a man (or a woman) may gush and gush and yet not be a villain. All this may be readily admitted. We are not proposing that insincere eulogists should be electrocuted or even sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment without the option of a fine. We are only anxious to indict them as a nuisance and a stumbling-block in the way of a healthy public opinion. For, after all, it is surely preferable that people should honestly enjoy inferior music rather than pretend that they revel in listening to genuine masterpieces. Here it is where the disadvantages of culture are so conspicuously manifested. There is absolutely no insincerity about a working-class audience. Where their æsthetic perceptions are concerned it has never occurred to them to make capital out of a simulated appreciation. It is only as you rise in the social scale that this false admiration makes itself apparent. It is essentially a species of snobbery, a sort of intellectual tuft-hunting, arising from the desire to ape the opinions of really enlightened experts, or, on the other hand, of self-assertive cranks.

Many composers have been victimised by this unenlightened and second-hand hero-worship—Wagner, perhaps, more than any other. So far the most fortunate in this respect has been Bach. To quote from the admirable essay on that composer, which appeared in the Contemporary Review for September, 1891, from the pen of an accomplished American critic, Mr. W. F. Apthorp: "No doubt the Bach-cult one finds in some quarters is not wholly free from cant; I never knew any cult that was. But I must say that I have found less sham love for Bach in people I have met than I have for most of the great composers. On the contrary, I have usually found Bach made the theme of the most up-and-down plain speaking. It is but another proof of the immense distance which separates him from the popular modes of musical thought. Many people who have to keep up a reputation for musical taste will bear the infliction of a Schumann quartet or a Brahms symphony quite smilingly; they will grin and bear it, and try to think they like it. But Bach marks the point where the worm will turn; he is the last straw that breaks the back of musical endurance, and people admit quite frankly that they find him intolerable."

FROM MY STUDY.

Messrs. Bentley and Son have just issued yet another book of musical recollections—one in which Mrs. A. M. Diehl, the well-known novelist, unloads her memory. Our authoress, most people should know, comes of a musical stock, and, as Miss Alice Mangold, was at one time a frequent figure on the concert platform. It is of the persons and circumstances encountered during that period of her life that she now writes.

One does not get far into this book before wishing that the authoress had given us her personal experiences and observations without such a lot of what may be called collateral matter, easily obtainable from other sources. The volume may have been made more informing by Mrs. Diehl's method, but I fear that it is less interesting. However, one can always skip; acting by the Hornerian principle of picking out the plums. The authoress takes us first to Paris, whither, by the advice of John Ella, she repaired for purposes of study. On friendly terms with Madame Erard, Miss Mangold naturally met with a number of impressive musical people, of whom she now gives us little sketches.

"One was Madame de Spontini, a picturesque old lady, who invariably wore a reticule with a bonbonnière and vinaigrette among its contents, and carried a fan in her trembling jewelled fingers."

Ernst Lubeck is described as "a big burly man with a curious artistic face, a round head, and prominent sea-green eyes." Then we have a glimpse of François Planté: "a slim, somewhat melancholy youth, reserved, yet mild and modest. His playing was of a most delicate and ethereal type, his touch bell-like and soft. Mozart, interpreted by him, was Mozart newly revealed. He was sensitive to a fault. Later in his career he took umbrage at the conduct of an audience who talked persistently while he played; after the performance he packed up his belongings, returned to his native place in the Pyrenees and remained in obscurity for the next ten years." That was a long sulk, and Planté had better have got some fun out of his impolite audience in the manner of, I think, the late Charles Hallé, who, being engaged to stimulate conversation by means of the pianoforte, played the same piece more than once during the evening and was congratulated by the hostess on the variety and interest of his selections. We get a curious picture of Ascher, once well known in England as a composer of "morceaux de salon." "A most humble-minded personage, he was anxious to excuse himself for his successes. 'I cannot imagine what the public see in them,' he said. 'To me, essentially a lover of classical music, they are atrocious, and so difficult to write. . . But I should like you to hear my real work,' he pleaded, 'my compositions that the publishers will not accept because of the unfortunate claptrap I was so very foolish as to write—in jest at first, I assure you—as a caricature! And they took me au sérieux.'" Mrs. Diehl drily adds: "We heard some of Monsieur Ascher's real and earnest work and—yawned, although he completely enjoyed himself."

While in Paris our authoress sought an interview with Hector Berlioz and obtained it. She now describes the somewhat squalid surroundings of the great man, but we are more concerned with himself:

"The portraits of Hector Berlioz are good. They give a fair idea of him as he was then—with sharp, pronounced features, flowing iron-grey hair, small but brilliant dark eyes, and a pensive, somewhat enigmatical expression. He bowed, murmured a few words of welcome, and with a courtly air insisted on our resuming the seats we had risen from as he came in. Then seating himself behind the writing table, he looked from one to the other, and gave a melancholy little smile. 'You are musical, you come from London, you must know my great friend Davison,' he said, and they were his first words. 'What a critic! what a man!' Then, with intense feeling, he spoke of Mr. Davison and of others, suddenly pausing—a trick of his—and abruptly changing the conversation." Berlioz returned the call: "He looked stiffly grave, his black coat tightly buttoned almost to the throat, his hand inserted under the lapel after the manner of old-fashioned portraits. At first he was politely abrupt and then requested that I would play to him." He proved a sympathetic listener, and did not withhold counsel. "He condemned the practice of many consecutive hours at the pianoforte, and the use of nerve stimulants, such as tea and coffee. 'Surtout,' he insisted, 'point de café noir.'"

Mrs. Diehl at one time took lessons of Henselt, and she naturally has much to say concerning that disappointing artist. When visiting London, in 1850, Henselt resided in the house of Karl Mangold, our authoress's father, and on that occasion she saw him for the first time. His likeness is thus sketched:

"I can almost see the handsome man now—not either tall or short, with a proud carriage of his dark head. As he stood on the hearth-rug gazing at us with his piercing luminous eyes—eyes which seemed to shine with an inner light of their own—he gave his peculiar smile; a smile which, while singularly sweet, had a petulant, impatient twist about it. Then he kissed us, and soon after dismissed our existence from his mind. But to childish observation and rumination he was an enigma. He seemed wrapped up in something, some matter, ponderous, weighty. He listened absently, awaking from a reverie, as it were, every now and then, and somewhat irritably snapping out a remark or a reply in his remarkably clear sibilant tones."

This probably meant dyspepsia. There can be no doubt of Henselt's nervousness, and nervousness is often the offspring of indigestion. Apropos, Mrs. Diehl tells us that when playing with an orchestra Henselt would remain "behind" during the introductory passages; then rushing on and pouncing upon the pianoforte. In 1850 he refused all offers to appear in public, nor would he play in private unless under exceptional circumstances. He was at his best on "practice" mornings, when quite alone, and then would his host permit amateurs to listen on the stairs and landings adjacent to his room. As a teacher, he was peculiar, to say the least. "He would come in in his white suit, a red fez on his head, a fly flapper in his hand, and, motioning his pupil to seat herself at the piano, would say, in his short, brusque way, 'Begin so-and-so.'" When in the mood he would, in ten or twenty minutes, clearly and concisely teach a pupil enough for months of work. "When he was not, he would cry, 'Falsch!' in various tones for the first half-hour, then kill flies silently till he marched out and banged the door. Or, worst of all, he would bring in the dogs and play with them, letting the unhappy pupil do her uttermost without comment, even to the end."

Mrs. Diehl chats pleasantly about English artists and critics in the sixties. It may be that some will read with surprise her estimate of Arabella Goddard, who is described as "the most faithful and reverent classical player it was possible to hear." "Not the faintest hint given of the composer's intent was overlooked. To hear her play Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Weber, Schubert, and the rest was to hear their compositions as they manifestly wished them to be played. Still, the lovely touch, the grace, the finish and poise of the most stupendous of mechanical difficulties enhanced the charm of the composer's ideas." It has been the fashion to sneer at Arabella Goddard, but, for all that, Mrs. Diehl's witness is true, and I endorse every word of it. On the subject of musical critics belonging to the same period, Mrs. Diehl speaks with the advantage of much personal knowledge. This probably explains the sympathy which she expresses for them in the discharge of their arduous and often unutterably thankless duties. As a personal friend of the late J. W. Davison, Mrs. Diehl naturally waxes eloquent on the subject of his undeniably great gifts. She says: "His was a mind whose great forces acted with lightning rapidity, and must have been hard to hold in check. As it was, his articles in The Times were generally outbursts of eloquence." This needs some qualification, for during the later years of his active career, when new principles and practices in music were gathering strength, and largely affecting men's minds, Davison often wrote with painful hesitation. Sometimes he would give up altogether, and in most cases his MS. went to the printer as a kind of caligraphic puzzle, not many words of the original remaining. In her estimate of Davison strictly as a critic, Mrs. Diehl comes near the truth, but does not quite reach the whole of it. The real key to the criticisms of Davison, in so far as they suggested a prejudice against new men and new methods, lies in the fact that his sympathies were often too strong for his judgment. In that I recognise almost his only weakness, but it was a serious one. Given up heart and soul to hero-worship—to the championship of those who, by their personal graces or the charm of their music, had won his favour—Davison's instinctive attitude towards others was that of a lover towards a possible rival. He would not hear of Schumann and Brahms, lest they should eclipse Mendelssohn of happy memory. In his more serious moments, when judgment was uppermost, he would yield somewhat to those who pointed out merit in the later men, but the very name of Mendelssohn served to kindle the fire of his affectionate admiration, and in its heat rivals had no chance. It was an amiable weakness, indicative of almost feminine intensity of feeling, but it undoubtedly brought to bear a limiting influence where there should have been expansion. Mrs. Diehl touches lightly some other critics of the mid-century. Gruneison is described as "a somewhat captious censor of whatever irked him," and reminds us that he was nick-named Diogenes, albeit he was not a philosopher. Henry

Lincoln, happily still surviving, though rarely seen, may be expected modestly to put from him the compliment of being a "graceful and charming writer." For Mrs. Diehl's opinion of critics now in the field I must refer the reader to the book itself, where, moreover, he will find an opinion that England stands pre-eminent in its musical press.

Mrs. Diehl recollects a concert given in the early fifties, at which Joachim and Rubinstein, then young men, appeared together. She was but a child, but can now draw from memory a clear picture of the artists:

"The two mere lads had but a faint welcome as they came upon the platform, the violinist with an awkward shamble and bow—he was a gawky lad, with a grim, short-sighted expression on his thick, somewhat heavy features, and as he bowed and began tuning his fiddle a thick lock of dark hair tumbled over his snub nose. The young pianist had a flat, leonine face, and the suggestion of the lion in his wide, massive brow was accentuated as he gazed around with his keen grey eyes—a slightly ferocious glance—while he played a few subdued chords. The pair—the pianist looked decidedly older than the ungainly young fiddler—were not prepossessing until they began to play."

Mrs. Diehl, on the authority of Madame Henselt, tells a story regarding "the fretful Robert (Schumann's) self-absorption and total disregard of his wife's well-being."

"One day, the Henselts drove them to see a certain tower whence a fine view of the city and its environs is attainable. Robert, who was in one of his querulous moods, glanced up at the tower, and saying, 'Come, Clara,' took his seat in the carriage again. 'I go not there, it would make me schwindlich,' he growled to Madame Henselt. 'But surely your wife will come?' she asked, as he pulled Clara's arm. 'Clara goes not where I cannot go,' he said, crossly, and the obedient spouse murmured an apology to her hostess, and meekly resumed her seat at his side. Henselt, the most arbitrary and dictatorial of husbands, was greatly disgusted with Schumann for manifesting similar tendencies." This does not tell greatly against Schumann. He may not have had the gift of climbing towers, and possibly doubted his wife's capacity in that line. Besides, even when being personally conducted a man should, in the last resort, keep his freedom of will intact.

Here I must leave Mrs. Diehl's book. The reader has seen that it is one which should be given a place in musical libraries.

X.

Edward Petre Novello, whose portrait of Mendelssohn forms the Supplement to our present issue, was a little-known member of a very distinguished family. The second son—Joseph Alfred being the eldest—of Vincent Novello, he was born May 9, 1813. He very early began to show remarkable aptitude as an artist, and subsequently became a student at the art school formed by Henry Sass, who numbered amongst his pupils Millais, Horsley, Frith, and Cope. Mr. J. C. Horsley, his fellow-student, remembers Edward Novello as an exceedingly clever youth. On December 10, 1831, he gained the silver medal at the Royal Academy for the best "drawing from the life"; at the same time Mr. Horsley gained a similar distinction "from the antique." Two years later Novello repeated his former success, but as he had already taken the medal the prize was withheld from him. At the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1833 he exhibited (No. 735), "A portrait of Mrs. Honey as 'Psyche'"; and in 1834, "Cupid riding on a lion—vide Spenser's 'Fairy Queen'" (No. 213). Edward Novello's most promising career was prematurely cut off by his early death, from consumption, at the age of twenty-two. Edward Novello painted the well-known portrait of his father, Vincent Novello, and also one of his gifted sister, Clara, now the Countess Gigliucci. He died at Hastings, January 4, 1836.

In the biographical sketch of Sir George Grove, which appeared in our last issue, we made no reference to him as a composer. Our ever-amusing contemporary Punch supplies the omission by lending us the following pictorial representation of the worthy knight, wherein he is depicted in the very act of committing his thoughts to paper.

Sir George Grove writing a long note.
From Punch, December 15, 1888.
(By kind permission of the Proprietors.)

Referring to the remarks in our last issue on the subject of military bands, Messrs. Boosey and Co. call our attention to the fact that they publish a book by Mr. J. A. Kappey entitled "Military Music: a history of wind-instrumental bands," a copy of which they have courteously sent us. Mr. Kappey's book, with which we were familiar, is, as might be expected, an excellent contribution to the literature of the subject, and the many illustrations of wind instruments give it special value. But the author only gives a few lines, for the most part quoted, to the subject of the army bands of this country. Therefore, we still hold to our opinion that "A history of British military music is much needed." Such a work could only be compiled by some competent enthusiast who would be armed with proper credentials from the War Office authorising him to obtain access to regimental records and official papers. Perhaps some member of Parliament will call the attention of the Government to the matter.

Sir George Grove's "Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies" has formed the subject of two important articles in French magazines. The first, which appeared in the Revue des deux Mondes of August 15, is from the able pen of M. Camille Bellaigue, who contributes a long, exhaustive, and highly eulogistic appreciation of Sir George and his Beethoven studies. There is much in this masterly article that we should like to quote; but its first paragraph, of which we give a free translation, will enable our readers to form some idea of the nature of M. Bellaigue's remarks:

"This book was wanted, but nothing is wanting in its execution. It exhausts a great subject, the greatest, perhaps, which could present itself to musical criticism, though from criticism it has nothing to fear. It is primarily as a musician, and as a distinguished one, that this English writer discourses on music. He really writes about Beethoven's symphonies and not by any means àpropos of them. Nothing appertaining to their constitution is unfamiliar to him, and nothing which touches upon them, however slightly, is indifferent to him. Studying them one after another in their chronological order, he considers first their organism and their specific being; the themes, the rhythm, and the gradations of tone. With these initial elements he proceeds to notice what affinities are established between them, what reactions, what results, in what sense, in what order, and to what end. Then from the foundation and the very substance, he passes to the accessories and surroundings. He studies their antecedents as well as their consequences. He is none the less curious in regard to their origin than in regard to their analogy. He is constantly collecting and collating. In commenting upon their splendid structure, he delights to make himself their historian, and is as much interested in their beauty as in their destiny. He omits neither a single sketch, a single copy, nor a single variant; and so far as concerns any effort in the matter of corrections and improvements, he discovers the secrets of genius and labour, which are so often blended as to be almost indistinguishable. . . . In a word, Sir George Grove is so well informed that there is nothing in regard to Beethoven's symphonies that can be known which he does not tell us."

The other article is by M. Michel Brenet, and appeared in Le Guide Musical of September 19. In the course of an interesting notice of the Beethoven book, M. Brenet refers to Sir George's remarks upon the alterations which conductors used to make at the return of the first subject in the "Eroica" Symphony (vide "Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies," p. 66). The French critic wishes to know the present custom of English conductors in regard to the playing of this passage. We beg to inform him that our chefs d'orchestre keep strictly to Beethoven's text.

The long-expected "Life" of Tennyson made its appearance on the 6th ult., the fifth anniversary of the great poet's death. It need scarcely be said that these two volumes, containing upwards of 1,000 pages, and published by Messrs. Macmillan and Co., are of absorbing interest. Tennyson's verse is so eminently musical that it may cause some surprise to find that he himself was not musical in the general acceptance of the term. "A. T. was not thought to have an ear for music," records his old friend, Edward FitzGerald. His son and biographer, the present Lord Tennyson, referring to the poet's early days, says that "he had a love for the simple style of Mozart, and for our own national airs and ballads, and played himself a little on the flute; but 'only cared for complicated music as suggesting echoes of winds and waves.'" In his eighty-third year, and shortly before his death, he "sang an octave to the pianoforte as clearly as possible." Tennyson, doubtless quite naturally, seems to have thought that true poetry was so musical in itself that to clothe it in the garb of music was a superfluity. To quote his son's words: "Music seemed to him to be the language of spirits, and he would say: 'I can feel the glory, though I cannot follow the music. I know that I miss a great deal by not understanding it. It often seems to me that music must take up expression at the point where poetry leaves off, and expresses what cannot be expressed in words.'" No thoughtful person will deny that there is an immense deal of truth in these words. After hearing "Comfort ye" sung, by which he was greatly impressed (as he was generally by Handel), he remarked: "It is difficult to believe that the man who wrote that was developed from the Ascidian." He was also fond of Beethoven's music, and of asking Joachim to play at his house. After hearing the great violinist play Tartini's "Trillo del Diavolo," he said, "I can feel the magic and poetry of the bowing."

The late poet laureate naturally had a predilection for his wife's settings of his poems. During a holiday journey he wrote to her: "I think it a great pity that your 'Sweet and low' hadn't the start of all these musical jottings"; and in a letter to the Duke of Argyll he said: "She [Lady Tennyson] has set it ['Riflemen, Form!'] far more to the purpose than most of Master Balfe's." But if the late Lady Tennyson was not distinguished as a composer, she had good judgment and gave her illustrious husband excellent advice. We are indebted to her for the present form of "Sweet and low." Tennyson had made two versions, which he sent to his wife to choose from before publication. "She chose the published one in preference to that which follows, because it seemed to her more song-like."

Unpublished Version.

Bright is the moon on the deep,
Bright are the cliffs in her beam,
Sleep, my little one, sleep!
Look he smiles, and opens his hands,
He sees his father in distant lands,
And kisses him there in a dream,
Sleep, sleep.

Father is over the deep,
Father will come to thee soon,
Sleep, my pretty one, sleep!
Father will come to his babe in the nest,
Silver sails all out of the West,
Under the silver moon,
Sleep, sleep!

It is interesting to find that Sir George Grove (whose name has been omitted from an otherwise exhaustive index) suggested to Tennyson that he should write a cycle of songs for music after the manner of the "Liederkreis" of Beethoven and Schumann. This characteristic suggestion of Sir George's resulted in "The Song of the Wrens," which Sir Arthur Sullivan set to music. We learn that Dr. Stanford (whose setting of "The Revenge" Tennyson thought to be "dramatic and fine"), during a long walk with the poet and Mr. Arthur Coleridge at Farringford, contributed his quota to the "merry stories" which all three narrated. "In January, 1892," records the biographer, "Dr. Hubert Parry stayed with us at Farringford, for he wished to hear my father read 'The Lotos-Eaters,' which he was setting to music. For the first time my father's voice, usually so strong, failed while reading this poem and the 'Ode on the Duke of Wellington,' which he was anxious that a great composer should set as he read it." This last sentence suggests the question whether the majority of composers sufficiently enter into the poetical spirit of their words before they set them to music. The temptation to further quotation from these fascinating volumes must be resisted, except one other reference to music. Someone said to the late laureate: "No one has written finer things about music than you have done." In this connection he thought that the simile in the following (from "Locksley Hall") were among his most successful lines:—

Love took up the harp of Life, and smote on all the chords with might;
Smote the chord of Self, that, trembling, pass'd in music out of sight.

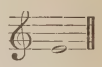
Miss Anna Williams, one of the most conscientious of vocalists, has retired from the concert platform with general regret on the part of the English public. In the course of some remarks upon her career, which appeared in the columns of a contemporary, Miss Williams said: "I have been before the public for twenty-three years, and I intend retiring into private life before my voice loses its power. I think twenty-three years is a long enough time for any woman to be in active work as I have been." Miss Anna Williams is the daughter of the late William Smith Williams, to whom, as "reader" to Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., the publication of "Jane Eyre" is due. On June 27, 1872, at the National Music meetings promoted by the late Willert Beale, and held at the Crystal Palace, Miss Williams gained the first prize, value £30, for sopranos, when she sang "Hear ye, Israel," from "Elijah," the judges being Sterndale Bennett, Benedict, and Arditi. But the clever young soprano had previously sung before the Queen at the Royal Albert Hall—where she recently took her farewell of the public—while that gigantic edifice was in the builder's hands! The actual date was December 3, 1870, and the following account of her singing may appropriately be reprinted:—

In the first instance, Frederick Brittan, one of the boys employed by the contractors, was permitted to sing, and afterwards Mr. Healey, an officer of the Science and Art Department, was called upon to play a set of scales. This having been done, Miss Anna Williams, an amateur, was commanded to sing, and her Majesty, in order to put to a somewhat severe trial the effects of a female voice in a large building, ascended to the balcony of the third story, and there, we are informed, the most delicate notes were perfectly audible.

The songs that Miss Williams sang, but without any accompaniment, on that novel occasion were "Ave Maria" (Bach-Gounod) and "Hear ye, Israel" (Mendelssohn). For this performance she received a gold watch and chain. Miss Williams subsequently studied under Henry Deacon, J. B. Welch, in London, and under Scafati, at Naples. On her return to London she took lessons, which, we believe, were of great value to her, from Madame Florence Lancia. The public career of the gifted singer is too well known to be recounted here. Suffice it to say that any work was perfectly "safe" when entrusted to her care. Although Miss Williams has said, or sung, her farewell to the public, it is highly satisfactory to know that, at the Royal College of Music and elsewhere, she will have many opportunities of inculcating her excellent style and artistic methods into the minds and voices of future singers. May she fully experience all the enjoyment in her retirement which she so richly deserves.

A musician of note has sent us the following letter upon a subject of national interest:—

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."



Sir,—In your last number "F. C." furnished specimens of suggested perversions of our National Anthem for use on several specific occasions; but he omitted one for general use. I venture to enclose a bar or two which should meet the case: this setting has been declared suitable for cathedrals as well as profaner areas, and (perhaps a doubtful advantage) the conductor might join in the vocal part, as it has been found to require no conducting:—

I had thought of sending the complete score to Queen's Hall, but I am assured that Gospodin Newmanninoff has only Russian national airs (with many variations) played there.

But I have not been lately.

Truly yours,

A very interesting article concerning the relations between Beethoven and the Baroness Dorothea von Ertmann is published in the Graz Tagespost, from the pen of Dr. M. von Kaiserfeld, in whose family some traditions of this charming and gifted lady are preserved. As Fräulein Graumann she was, during the first and second decades of the present century, a most highly esteemed pianist in the Austrian capital. She was possessed of great personal beauty, tall of stature, with noble features, expressive eyes, and a wealth of dark, curly hair. In her interpretation of Beethoven's music she excelled. It was spiritual and poetic, and entered with an artistic insight, rare at the time, into the minutest details of the master's intentions. It is, therefore, not surprising that Beethoven, on his part, felt for this remarkable woman an admiration bordering upon adoration. He called her his "Dorothea-Cæcilia," and looked upon her as the High Priestess of his art. It was to her that he dedicated his Pianoforte Sonata in A major (Op. 101); and in a letter announcing the fact, and now published for the first time, he requests her to look upon it as "an evidence of his high estimation of her talent as an artist and of her person." It was an attachment of a different order from that which the master entertained for the Countess Therese von Brunswick, his "Unsterbliche Geliebte." Dorothea-Cæcilia, though most happily married to an officer in the Austrian army, was not spared some of the bitter experiences of life. When her last surviving child was buried, she was seized with a serious mental malady. Tearless and apathetic, she fell into a kind of stupor, declining to be seen by anyone, even amongst her most intimate friends. Beethoven would not be so denied. He called at the house one day, and, entering her room without addressing her, seated himself at the pianoforte. There he improvised "in seiner Weise" for the space of an hour, until the eyes of the sufferer were bathed in tears and the wished-for crisis in her condition had set in. Beethoven had conveyed to her in language far more eloquent than mere words the consolation she so much needed. In 1831 Baron von Ertmann was stationed at Milan as the Austrian general in command, and it was then that Mendelssohn paid him and his wife the visit described in one of his charming letters to his family. He desired to make the acquaintance of "the interesting lady of whom I had heard so much, and who was made such a pet of by Beethoven." His reception was a most cordial one. The Baroness played Beethoven's C sharp minor and D minor Sonatas to him, and "I think I have learnt something from her," records the composer of "Elijah." Dorothea von Ertmann was an aunt of Madame Mathilde Marchesi, the distinguished vocal teacher residing in Paris, whose maiden name was Graumann. She died in Vienna, on March 16, 1849, at the age of sixty-eight, and was buried in the old Churchyard of Währingen, where her grave was traced recently, though not without some difficulty, by Dr. von Kaiserfeld.

The following interesting contribution to the history of the baton in England appears as a footnote by the translator of "A comparison between the French and Italian Musick and Operas," translated fron the French, and published in London in 1709:—

Some years since the Master of the Musick in the Opera at Paris had an Elboe Chair and Desk plac'd on the Stage, where, with the Score in one Hand, and a Stick in the other, he beat Time on a Table put there for that purpose, so loud, that he made a greater noise than the whole Band, on purpose to be heard by the Performer. By degrees they removed this Abuse from the Stage to the Musick Room, where the Composer beats the Time in the same manner, and as loud as ever. The same was observed in London six or seven Years ago; but since the Italian Masters are come among us, and the Opera's have been introduced, they have put a stop to that ridiculous Custom, which was Founded more upon an ill Habit than any Necessity there was for it, as doing more harm than good; for the Opera's are better performed now without it than any Piece of Musick was formerly; because the eye was too much Distracted, being obliged to mind the beating of the Measure, and the Score at the same time; besides, it kept the Singer and the Player in too much Subjection, and fear of Errors, by which means they were deprived of that Liberty so absolutely necessary to Musick and which gives a Strength and Spirit to the Notes.

The prospectus of the fortieth season of the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts contains an announcement which will be received with genuine and widespread regret. We quote Mr. Arthur Chappell's own words: "Before announcing the arrangements made for the forthcoming concerts, the Director desires to express deep and sincere regret that circumstances have compelled the retirement of Signor Piatti and Mr. Ries from the posts they so long held in connection with the Popular Concerts. Both performers took part in the first season, and, with scarcely a break, continued their services through thirty-nine years. Patrons of these concerts will share the Director's feelings in losing colleagues so true and faithful, artists so eminent and experienced." Mr. Ries, who is a nephew of Ferdinand Ries, Beethoven's pupil, first came to London in 1853. He has played second violin in the "Monday Popular" quartet ever since the commencement of the concerts in 1859. With what efficiency, artistic conscientiousness, and self-effacement he has discharged this important duty it is hardly necessary to say. The name of his distinguished colleague, Signor Piatti, is a household word in musical circles. It is fifty-three years ago since he first set foot on English soil, when his remarkable violoncello playing at once stamped him as an artist of the first rank. This position he has worthily maintained for upwards of half-a-century. He has been a tower of strength to Mr. Arthur Chappell's delightful concerts, not only in the concerted music, but as a solo player of the highest order. The director's "deep and sincere regret" at the retirement of these two eminent artists will be fully shared by those who know their sterling worth and high attainments.

The Italian Government, in the Spring of this year, sent a musician, in the person of Count Giuseppe Franchi Verney, to report upon French and English school music to the Italian Education Department. A translation of the most interesting passages of the Count's exhaustive report on French and English schools appears in the School Music Review for November, and we hope to refer to some features of it in our next issue. Meanwhile, we give a short extract from the document, which will doubtless be read with great satisfaction: "Many people would decline to regard England as the musical country, par excellence. On the other hand, there are few countries in this world where music is made the object of such devout, enthusiastic worship. It might almost be said that music is a vital and indispensable element of English life."

What is up-to-date music? This question is suggested by a recent review of an arrangement for the organ of Mendelssohn's Allegretto movement from his "Hymn of Praise" symphony. The reviewer says: "The melody flows delightfully enough, but the serenity of its expression helps to make one extremely conscious of how out-of-date it all is." Here, then, is the answer to our question. According to the reviewer, "serenity of expression" should not be a feature of modern music. We calmly await the next sapient utterance from the same oracle.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

It is not dignified to air a private grievance unless public good is possible from so doing. The proper editing of festival word-books may, in some faint degree, be a matter of concern to amateurs, and on that account I "make my moan." Mr. Cowen's scena, "The Dream of Endymion," was in the programme at Birmingham, and I, as the author of the words, looked to see them reproduced from the Philharmonic book in which they originally appeared. Alas for my confidence! The lines were printed from a copy of the music, with all the composer's repetitions of phrases, and even words. More than that, two lines were sometimes made out of one. More than that, the quotation from Keats, which indicated a connection between the scena and his wonderful poem, was omitted altogether. And this at Birmingham!

I read (not in The Musical Times): "The song which took the prize at the recent Welsh Eisteddfod at Pontypool was Walther's 'Preislied' from 'Die Meistersinger.'" The singer took the prize, not the song, and the Eisteddfod was held at Newport, not Pontypool.

One more Verdi story is going round: "Verdi has handed over to his friend Boïto a box containing the complete score of an opera, which is not to be opened till he is dead." The marines may believe it.

Has he come at last? A labourer in the Venice arsenal, says Rumour, has written two operas, which will be performed in that city next season. He is entirely self-taught.

Bird-o'-Freedom Sawin re-appears in the person of Mr. Albert D. Mueller. He has written a song styled "Columbia's Appeal," hoping that it will be to the United States what the "Marseillaise" is to France and the "Wacht am Rhein" to Germany. Noticing this effusion in the Musical Courier, Mr. Philip Hale gives a specimen verse:

Unfurl the banners! Proudly wave
Old Glory's stripes in all their charms!
The Sons of Freedom to enslave,
The tyrant's minions haste to arms!
To drag our eagles in the mire!
To wrest from us our heritage!
This is our enemie's desire!
And make us slaves in freedom's age!
"To arms!" "To arms!"
Columbia's sons, assemble!
Your treasures to defend!
Ye tyrants, tremble!

Even this is not so bad as another patriotic ditty, from which Mr. Hale quotes two lines only:

The Lord is like the kangaroo,
And like the roaring buffalo.

It is a thousand pities that the volume in which this hymn appeared was "suppressed by unsympathetic relatives."

A book entitled "Schopenhauer's Table Talk" is promised. It will be racy reading, if the great Pessimist ever said, as reported: "Thank your friend Wagner in my name for sending me his 'Nibelungen,' but he ought to hang music on the nail; he has more genius for poetry. I, Schopenhauer, remain true to Rossini and Mozart." And again: "He has sent me his Trilogy. The fellow is a poet, not a musician. There are mad things in it, though. Once, at the end of the first Act of the 'Walküre,' you read, 'The curtain falls quickly.' But if it doesn't fall quickly, there will be wicked things to see."

Here is a quatrain from a recent tribute to Beethoven:

He was a small and not good-looking man,
Yet monarchs paused to let him pass. The same
Was never shown to such before. The brave
Respected him as only bravest can.

The editor of the Concert Goer asks a question:

Why do we cry down such music as Donizetti's for the simple reason that it is not analytical? It is pure, it is wholesome, it refreshes and delights all who hear it in the proper spirit, the spirit that is willing to accept a beautiful thing for its beauty's sake, gratefully and without questioning exhaustively its logic, its philosophy, and its construction.

May Miss Anna Williams, as a teacher, enjoy a career no less successful and happy than was hers as a singer. I am not disposed to say that this most capable and honoured vocalist quits public life in full possession of her powers. That would be to charge her with caprice, even with desertion from duty. The simple fact is that Miss Williams, too honest to give the public of that which cannot be her best, has had the strength of mind—let me say the manliness at once—to retire and devote herself to work which she can still do perfectly. Her example might be followed with advantage in many cases.

There seems to be a "rift within the lute" of the Burlington Choral Society—a body that has done good service in East Yorkshire by giving festival and other concerts, under the direction and with the financial assistance of Squire Boswell, of Thorpe Hall. The secretary, Mr. Peacock, having left Burlington, Mr. Boswell has issued a circular to the members, the tone of which, I regret to say, is not inspiriting, and points to some lack of interest, not on his part, but on theirs. I trust I do the Burlington singers no injustice in the matter, but, anyhow, here is a case in which ranks should be closed and a resolve to march forward be carried out. Let all concerned act as though the credit of musical Yorkshire depended upon their resolution. Does the county of broad acres ever put its hand to the plough and then look back?

In the course of a letter addressed to an American editor, Madame Marchesi said:—

Wagner, that musical colossus, came to destroy completely all that still remained of the great school of song. For this celebrated German composer singing does not exist. The singer becomes the humble servant of the orchestra. That which is above all to be deplored is that the younger composers, instead of considering the exigencies of the vocal instrument, walk blindly in the footsteps of Richard Wagner.

Vocal studies are declared of no use; science has been replaced by charlatanism. Nothing remains for us save to pray for the coming of a new musical Messiah.

It is a pity that the late Charles Keane did not live long enough to sing this ditty in praise of the bagpipes:

Away with your fiddles and flutes,
As music for wedding or ball,
Pianofortes, clarinets, lutes,
The bagpipes surpasses them all.

. . . . . .

Upheaved the fair dancers will feel,
Like birds poising light on the wing,
As nimbly they trip in the reel,
And roll off the steps of the fling.

In music, in warfare, in song,
With bagpipes, and banners unfurled,
Like a torrid simoon borne along,
The Highlanders lighten the world.

Simoon is good. I understand that when camels hear one coming they bury their heads in the sand. It is to be feared that bagpipes are coming. In that case what shall we do?

The Birmingham Argus complains that the low pitch used at the festival "has had to bear the brunt of conservative opposition and prejudiced criticism." Of course the Argus cannot be expected to tolerate anything conservative, but it might concede, in a specially technical matter, that those who differ from it are not necessarily prejudiced. For myself, I do not fear the epithets of the Argus, and I repeat that the lowered pitch was, in point of effect, disastrous. "Mr. Edward Lloyd," adds the Birmingham journal, "gracefully accommodated himself to the inevitable." Mr. Lloyd is a good-natured man, and he suffered for it during the week.

With much pleasure I quote from the Musical Standard the subjoined remarks upon the appearance of little Bruno Steindel at the Crystal Palace: "The Society for the Protection of Children might surely stand, like Moses, 'in the gap,' and try to stop such exhibitions. All contemporary journalists write to the same effect." Not all, unfortunately; but I, for one, will have nor part nor lot in the showing of a poor baby of seven, and I cry "Shame!" upon those who abet it.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Why the music of the Sanctuary comes in for so little, or, of late, no consideration at the annual Church Congress is a mystery which awakens in the minds of many practical and earnest men surprise and regret. In the words of an eminent musician, sacred music is now "an integral and not, as formerly, a subsidiary part of the services" of the Church, and so can no longer be wisely neglected, overlooked, or put aside in the councils of our Church authorities. However, seeing the marked interest many clergymen now take in the spread and progress of Church music, the absence of any serious attempt to deal with the subject at the Church Congress meetings may perhaps be properly ascribed to the want of preliminary action on the part of our Church musicians, rather than to studied or even accidental neglect on the part of those responsible for the arrangement of the Church Congress proceedings. Possible causes are the loss of such clerical Church musicians as the Rev. Sir Fredk. Ouseley and the Rev. Sir Henry Baker; the completion of the labours of the "Ancient and Modern" Hymn Book Committee, and the consequent apparent inactivity of that influential body; and the great pressure of work and responsibility falling to the lot of our "chief musicians," whereby they may conscientiously feel disinclined to advance within the range of new sources of artistic and professional anxiety. Then music has, perhaps, still to find a place of real honour and active usefulness in the scheme of those who guide the work done in the recently established Church House.

The necessary impetus to a broader and more earnest consideration of the pressing claims of Church music might, of course, be given with effect and at the right moment by that powerful body, the Royal College of Organists; and the new and useful Church Orchestral Society is also in a position to request an opportunity at some future Church Congress for the discussion of matters and for the exposition of information concerning its immediate mission in connection with the advancement of sacred art.

The Anglican communion must perforce take the subject of music in church into consideration ere long, in view of the present decided attitude of public opinion. Not only from within, but from without, there are abundant signs of the forward movement. The Nonconformist bodies, long reluctant to move, are now advancing with no uncertain steps in the adoption of Church musical forms and methods; and they have many able musicians working with them to this end. Indeed, no Church can afford to turn aside from this burning question of modern religious life; least of all can the National Church, so fully alive to the importance of so many religious and social movements, consistently or safely overlook a matter which may be described, without exaggeration, as affecting the spiritual minds of all church-going people.

A prominent possible musical feature of the forthcoming congress in London of the Incorporated Society of Musicians is a proposed performance of Tallis's Motet in forty parts, under the direction of Dr. A. H. Mann, who edited the modern edition issued a few years ago by Messrs. Weekes and Co. Should the performance take place, and of this there can be little doubt in view of Dr. Mann's enthusiasm and energy, the personnel of the combined choirs will probably be as interesting as was the case upon the revival of this work under the baton of John Hullah many years ago, when the Rev. Sir Fredk. Ouseley sang the first alto part in one of the choirs, and Henry Leslie, and quite a host of other distinguished musicians, took part in a memorable performance of this masterpiece. Modern musicians do not expect proportionate effect from choral works written in a great number of parts; though the elaboration of the orchestral score has become the sine qua non of modern art.

Sir John Stainer's cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," one of the most successful of modern Church oratorios, was included in the music selected for the recent inauguration of the new organ in Bangor Cathedral.

The introduction of an organ in Free St. George's Church, Edinburgh, seems to be regarded in the North as an event illustrating the general capitulation of the sterner and more cautiously advancing members of a Christian body so long resisting the introduction of instrumental music in Church. The congregation of St. George's, Edinburgh, are to be congratulated, not only upon this display of the courage of their new opinion in this matter, but also upon the engagement of so gifted and able an organist as Mr. Alfred Hollins.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Something more than local interest is attached to the selection of an organist for the Town Hall, Leeds. Feeling this, probably, the committee dealing with the appointment have proceeded to advertise for candidates a second time; the forty-two applications already made not, in their opinion, including a sufficient number of eminent names. As pointed out by a weekly contemporary, the Leeds Corporation may take to themselves the not undignified course of seeking out some suitable man, through the assistance of two or three professional advisers.

There are, however, other aspects of this question deserving attention, not only in connection with Leeds, but with regard to the present condition of professional life in the musical world. The musical artist of high reputation stands in an attitude too fixed to be necessarily dependent upon official positions; although it is right and natural that such positions should be in the hands of men of high repute. All the same, men of the front ranks of the profession in London and elsewhere, especially in the metropolis, where good positions and large incomes are plentiful even in these days of sharp competition, are not to be tempted by even such important offices as that of organist to the city of Leeds. Then there is a lesson on the other side—the lesson of dignified self-respect in art matters, which seems a difficult one for provincial civic authorities. To apply these words directly, may it not be asked—is it not possible that one of several accomplished organists now resident in Leeds is the right man for the position of city organist? Surely in the wealth of artistic skill happily now the possession of this country, the Leeds Corporation need not travel far to find a "fit and proper person" to undertake the office of organist at their magnificent Town Hall.

Year by year the question of town organists exchanging duty during the summer holidays comes to the front, but apparently with no greatly increased hopes of practical solution. In truth, there are serious difficulties in the exchange of such onerous duties as those of church organists, involving different methods and readings of the service music, and strange organs to be manipulated. Our American cousins appear to be more fortunately placed in this regard; and many of the younger organists visit Paris and other Continental cities in quest of artistic, not to add linguistic experience, and rightly to widen out their knowledge of the world, for travelling by the American is wisely regarded as a second education. A large number of these young organists find their way to London on their way home, in order to add to their artistic experience by intercourse with some of our best known metropolitan organ-players. Much is it to be regretted that our young English church organists cannot apparently secure more complete and valuable holiday experiences of a similar kind.

The Plymouth County Council recently decided not to allow Sunday afternoon organ recitals in the local Guildhall; an unfortunate and short-sighted decision, to be reversed, doubtless, as time goes on.

In the course of the debate on this matter, Mr. John Hele, the esteemed organist of the Plymouth Guildhall, observed that "all good music is sacred"; words which should always be kept in mind in connection with this subject.

There is a story of a Bishop who expressed this opinion in the words: "the note C is the same both in and out of church." In the abstract this is true; all the same, good music may be soiled by unworthy words or worldly use and association. Even organists seem a little in danger of forgetting this sub-contrary proposition, by introducing not only into the programmes of Sunday afternoon recitals, but by bringing into church specimens of operatic music in some cases surrounded with unworthy associations, and technically unfitted for the organ keyboard. The selection of music for instrumental use in our concert halls and, one is compelled to add, in view of many advanced recital schemes in our churches, demands earnest attention. After making liberal concessions as regards the selection of music of various styles for Sunday use, there is wisdom in reserving some judgment as to appropriateness in this, as in all things.

Through the kindness of a correspondent, we are favoured with some particulars of the "organ-concerts" given by Herr Hans Fährmann in St. John's Church, Dresden. These are divided into cycles. After giving several series consisting of the works of Bach, Mendelssohn, Merkel, and Rheinberger, and one course of historical concerts, Herr Fährmann commenced in 1896 a series of German and French organ music, and is now dealing with the German and English schools. His programme for the 4th ult. included Mr. John E. West's musicianly and effective Organ Sonata in D minor and Dr. W. H. Sangster's admirable Fantasia (Toccata) in E minor. In an interesting programme-preface Herr Fährmann refers to our excellent, varied, and extensive modern English school of music for organ, chamber-organ, and harmonium in appreciative terms. He names S. S. Wesley, W. T. Best, George Garrett, W. G. Wood, W. H. Sangster, among composers, with a special reference to the younger writers, John E. West, Battison Haynes, and the American composer, W. Dayas.

A series of recent recitals by Dr. Bellerby, given in Holy Trinity Church, Margate, presents interesting programmes, including a Sonata in D minor, Faulkes; Cantilène Pastorale by the same composer; Offertoire, G. F. Vincent; Minuet, Bellerby, and Festive March, Ferris Tozer. The classics were duly honoured in Dr. Bellerby's selections. The list of pieces played at Dr. G. H. Smith's recital at Sculcoates Parish Church, on the 9th ult., included Canzona, King Hall, and Guilmant's Sonata arrangement of his Symphony for organ and orchestra.

At the opening of the new organ by Messrs. Richardson and Son, of Manchester, at St. Julian's, Benniworth, on the 14th ult., two recitals were given by Mr. C. W. Godson, of Cleethorpes, Grimsby. The programmes included Handel's so-called "Nightingale" Concerto, the first movement of which, with its bird imitations, it has been thought might have given a suggestion to Beethoven for his Pastoral Symphony had he known the older master's work; Lemmens's somewhat hackneyed "Storm" Fantasia, and Bach's St. Ann's Fugue, one of the most glorious pieces of fugal counterpoint in existence.

The great instrument in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, heard to such advantage through the skilful manipulation of Dr. Peace, is undergoing alterations under the builders' hands. It will be re-opened in about two months.

The fine new four-manual organ built by Mr. August Gern for the Church of St. John the Baptist, Kensington, will be opened by Sir Walter Parratt, on the 17th inst., an event of interest to the lovers of organ music.

The recent programmes of M. Auguste Wiegand, of the Sydney (N.S.W.) Town Hall, do honour to that gentleman's energy and determination to popularise organ music in the busy Antipodean city.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

Certainly the wealth of the Midland capital does not decrease, nor is there any abatement of the old will to spend it liberally in a good cause. Wherefore the Festival of 1897 stood forth as well furnished unto all good works as the best of its predecessors. Soloists, orchestra, chorus, all were there, as excellent as money could buy, and qualified to make ordinary assurance of success more than doubly sure, but for the tendency of man's best laid schemes to disappoint him. See here the names of the principal singers: Albani, Anna Williams, Evangeline Florence, Marie Brema, Hilda Foster, Ada Crossley, George May, Edward Lloyd, Ben Davies, Andrew Black, Plunket Greene, and Bispham. A goodly company, a better than which is hardly to be found under present circumstances. The band included forty violins, equally divided into firsts and seconds, sixteen violas, sixteen violoncellos, and fourteen double-basses—in all a force of eighty-six "strings." The "wind" numbered thirty-two, and the percussion, &c., eight; the grand total being 126. The chorus, on its part, included some 350 performers, who had long been in the training hands of Dr. Swinnerton Heap. Taking into account the dimensions and quality of this executive force, and the careful preparation given to it by such a conductor as Hans Richter, the festival authorities were entitled to feel themselves armed at all points against failure through neglect, and liable only to the accidents which proverbially will happen under the best regulated conditions. Financial disaster of course never entered into their calculations, even as a remote contingency. It may be rather that the committee hoped for more than the £5,000 which was handed over to the General Hospital as the sum of donations and the balance of profit.

It boots not to tell here of rehearsals for the work of the four days, the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th ult. Birmingham funds permitted them to be sufficient in number; Dr. Richter answered for the rest, and when the festival opened with "Elijah," before an audience which left not a single seat vacant, the outlook appeared as bright as the glorious blue sky that smiled down upon the gathering. That it looked more roseate than it proved to be was nobody's fault in particular, though to my mind those who were responsible for lowering the pitch, and thereby not the pitch alone, may take to themselves a disquieting share of responsibility. They dulled "Elijah" to begin with, hampered some of the soloists, and did not leave even the chorus unharmed.

Turning to the programme, I have to indicate three new works upon which the committee relied to sustain their reputation for enterprise. Of these, one turned out a positive success; another made a more moderate, though still a favourable impression; while the third was, on various accounts, less fortunate than its companions. The happiest lot fell to a Requiem composed by Professor Stanford—a work received by its audience without the least misgiving or hesitancy, and favourably spoken of by all the critics, save those who act as wreckers or jesters. The Requiem was produced on Wednesday morning, the 6th ult., the composer conducting, and the principal singers being Madame Albani, Miss Marie Brema, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Plunket Greene. It is less necessary to speak of the performance, albeit it offered some lessons for the general advantage, than of the work itself; which has not died away—which, indeed, is likely to remain. The composer—and this is a point to be observed above most—did not shrink from the task of preparing a Requiem which should reflect the spirit and feeling of Roman Catholic ceremonial. He was justified in this boldness, for we have no more versatile musician than Dr. Stanford. I will not say that he is a "quick change artist," but that he can change, and do so thoroughly. From the evidence of the new work he might have been all his life engaged in writing church music for the sensitive and passionate Latin peoples, whose half-swooning languors and impetuous outbursts he has reproduced in music with astonishing fidelity. "Oh!" it may be said, "then the Requiem cannot be sincere." That conclusion does not follow from the premises, or, if it do, we shall have to strike from the books of the masters very many of their best pages. Sincere the Requiem assuredly is, or it would not convince. Whether it represent the style most congenial to the composer's taste and judgment is another matter, and one that concerns him alone. He has elected to write a Latin Office as the Latin races would have it, and the crux is whether he has succeeded from that point of view. In my opinion he has succeeded greatly, and given to us one of the cleverest works of modern times—one which, looked at per se, may even be called great.

In a general notice such as the present, particular description and criticism cannot be given. Other and better opportunities will occur for minute remarks. I should like, however, to point out that Dr. Stanford is, if anything, most successful in dealing with the tremendous and exacting "Dies Iræ." When setting these words to music he must have had in his mind other efforts by great predecessors, and may have felt a little uneasy lest while emulating their spirit he should fall into imitation of their letter. There was no cause for fear. The music of the "Dies Iræ" seeks to effect the same kind of expression as others have aimed at—the kind, that is to say, which the poetry demands from a modern composer. But the end is reached in Dr. Stanford's own way, and the means often strike us as fresh, and as always free from banality. Leading themes are freely employed, but in simple forms, and the power of the music lies chiefly in its broad and suggestive—I had almost written pictorial—effects. Developed examples of counterpoint are sparingly given, as may be supposed in the case of a work having the character above indicated; but "Quam olim Abrahæ" is set as a really fine fugue on a striking diatonic subject. It is rather curious that the "Sanctus," upon which the composer obviously spent much pains, and from which he may have looked for corresponding results, is the least effective part of the work. The reason of this cannot well be shown without the aid of music type. Enough now that though the music looks well on paper, and is commended by its uncommon general plan, many critics who heard it at Birmingham were left unconvinced. To be sure, the performance came short of perfection; for which reason I do not yet suggest that Dr. Stanford should try his hand at the "Sanctus" a second time. Here I must pass on with a parting word of congratulation upon the addition of a really fine work to our English repertory.

The novelty I have placed second—Mr. German's symphonic poem "Hamlet"—was performed on the evening of Tuesday, the 5th ult.; the composer conducting in this case also. Mr. German has had much experience in writing incidental and illustrative music to plays, and the general success of his efforts no doubt encouraged him to venture upon an independent work having as its poetic basis the most difficult drama and the most perplexing character which the stage can show. Naturally, it is Hamlet himself that fills the music. Ophelia and the King enter into it with comparative perfunctoriness and for the sake of relief. The Prince is "the thing," but though Mr. German has made a bold and clever bid for success, I cannot say that he has fully achieved it. How, indeed, should he? In so far as the composer emerges vanquished, he is beaten by the perplexities of his subject. It is certainly unfortunate that the theme representative of the chief character is, both melodically and rhythmically, that of the opening phrase in the Prayer from Rossini's "Moïse." Not much importance, however, need be attached to this. The subject is a good one anyhow, and the finest conceivable would have gone but a very little way to express in music a personage so contradictory as Hamlet. The music relating to Ophelia and the King serves its purpose admirably, but the mind returns to the problem of the piece and awaits a solution which does not quite come. Mr. German secured a performance with which little fault could be found, and received the usual compliments.

Mr. Somervell's "Ode to the Sea," introduced on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., completed the tale of new works, and yet again the composer elected to wield the baton. Perhaps he would have done better to leave his piece in the hands of Dr. Richter, but it avails nothing to speculate on the point. A more important matter presents itself in Mr. Somervell's choice of a libretto. I do not know whether or no the writer designed the poem of "An Ode to the Sea" for musical treatment. Looking at its character, which is that of a poem for reading and reflection, I should say not; but if he did, then he made a conspicuous mistake. Mr. Somervell, in accepting the words, placed himself at a serious disadvantage, for I do not see how even a far more experienced composer could have made much of them. Of course the musician suffers most from the common mistake. The monotony and occasional turgidity of the poem passed almost inevitably into the music, and the audience quickly began to show signs of weariness. It does not follow that the "Ode to the Sea" will fail to improve on acquaintance, but in any case it can hardly pass as representative of a composer who, in other works, has shown that he can wield a graceful and pleasing pen.

The festival had the further distinction of producing a new edition of Purcell's "King Arthur," prepared by Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, and performed, under Dr. Richter's direction, on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult., with Miss Anna Williams, Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. May (alto), Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Bispham as soloists. This revival was, to some extent, no doubt, an echo of the Purcell celebration, and, in other part, of the increased regard paid to our old English master for some years past. Curiously enough, two gentlemen of antiquarian taste became engaged upon "King Arthur" at the same time—namely, the editor of the Birmingham version and Mr. W. H. Cummings, for many years a successful Purcell student. What is more, the two versions came out within a day or two of each other, that of Mr. Fuller Maitland having a slight start. Here, then, is an opportunity to observe how the old work presented itself to two men equally anxious for the integrity of the text, and equally painstaking in arriving at the truth. By means of a comparison we can get nearer the actual "King Arthur" than ever before, and that is a great point gained. A few cuts were made in view of the Birmingham performance, which was, on the whole, efficient and received with much interest if not with actual enthusiasm. The more conspicuous and remarkable effects of the performance were made in "Come, if you dare," by Mr. Ben Davies's vigorous declamation, and in the Frost Song, by Mr. Bispham, who was curiously realistic in his shiverings and chatterings.

I shall merely mention the familiar works in the programme. They were, from Beethoven, the "Abendlied" (with a clever orchestral transcription of the accompaniment by Dr. Richter), the Symphony in C minor, and the "Leonora" Overture; from Mozart, "Non mi dir" (Madame Albani) and the Symphony in G minor; from Bach, the cantata, "O Light everlasting"; from Handel, "The Messiah"; from Berlioz, "Faust"; from Gluck, the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; from Schubert, the Mass in E flat; from Hubert Parry, "Job"; from Tschaïkowsky, the

"Pathetic" Symphony; from Cowen, the tenor scena, "Dream of Endymion"; from Wagner, overture, "Die Meistersinger," Scene iii., Act III., of "Die Walküre," Siegmund's "Love Song," and the "Siegfried Idyll"; from Brahms, the Symphony (No. 1), the "Song of Destiny," and Variations on an air by Haydn; from Dvorák, the "Carnival" Overture; from Marschner, the song "An jenem Tag"; from Schumann, the "Manfred" Overture; from Weber, "Ocean, thou mighty monster"; from Cherubini, the "Medea" Overture; from Mendelssohn, "Elijah."

The performance of the foregoing vocal works was greatly favoured by the almost uniform excellence of the principal singers. It may be that Miss Marie Brema scarcely came up to expectation in "Elijah," but amend was made in the dramatic pieces allotted to her. For the rest, Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Crossley, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Plunket Greene, and Mr. Bispham did capital service, entirely worthy of their repute.

To sum up this notice without dwelling with needless minuteness upon features which were not quite satisfactory, let me say that the attention of the committee should be given to the task of making the choral performances equal the orchestral. At the recent festival this certainly was not the case, the intonation of the chorus, the unusual tempi, and the general depression, caused apparently by the low pitch, were serious drawbacks in a department long famous for its excellence. This will have to be changed. I recognise the importance of orchestral music, but musical festivals have their strength in choral works, and by them they stand or fall. Wherefore, whatever has to be done at Birmingham by way of making up lost ground should be done resolutely and unflinchingly. There is no other course, and the end is worth the pains.

THE ROYAL CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.

The visits to London of the Royal Carl Rosa Company are ever welcome, and how widely they are appreciated in the metropolis has been indicated by the large audiences that for the most part have prevailed at Covent Garden Theatre since the company began its season there on the 2nd ult. The work selected for that date was Puccini's "La Bohème," of which the first performance, in English, at Manchester was noticed in the number of The Musical Times for June last. The work does not improve on further acquaintance, the slightness of its story becomes more apparent, and the obviousness of the efforts of the composer to secure effects stands out with increased clearness. Moreover, the music is no less essentially Italian in idiom than the subject is peculiarly French, and consequently there arises a sense of artificiality and endeavour where there should be perfect union. Only in the love duets between Mimi and Rudolph can the composer be said to be entirely successful. The music in these scenes, however, charms by its delicacy and refinement rather than by its depth of sentiment. Great ingenuity is shown in the ensembles, and that at the end of the second act is remarkably clever. The opera was excellently played. Miss Alice Esty presented a most sympathetic embodiment of Mimi, and Miss Bessie Macdonald imparted all needful vivacity to the part of the good-hearted but flighty Musetta. The four students, Rudolph, Marcel, Schaunard, and Colline, were also effectively personated by Messrs. Salvi, Maggi, Charles Tilbury, and William Dever, and Mr. Homer Lind cleverly doubled the parts of the Landlord and Alcindaro. Justice was done to the picturesque orchestration, in which consecutive fifths are by no means shunned by the composer, and saving that the principal climax in the second act was repeated, Mr. Claude Jaquinot is to be commended for the artistic finish of the interpretation.

Such favourable criticism cannot be extended to many of the other performances. The directors have unwisely left their trained chorus in the country and engaged a new body for the London season. Seeing that excellence of ensemble was the chief feature for which the Royal Carl Rosa Company has been famed, such a procedure indicates extraordinary managerial blindness or want of forethought. The result has been that in operas in which the chorus has an important part, the performances have fallen below the standard formerly attained by this company. The interpretation of Wagner's "Meistersinger," on the 14th ult., was, owing to this and other causes which have been already noticed elsewhere, little short of a fiasco.

Miss Maude Rondes, Miss Lilian Coomber, Mr. Barron Berthald, and Mr. Lloyd d'Aubigne, who are new recruits to the company, have all made promising appearances, and other artists who have fully sustained their respective reputations are Madame Marie Duma, Miss Rita Elandi, Miss Agnes Janson, and Miss Olitzka; and Messrs. Brozel, Lemprière Pringle, G. A. Fox, Frank Wood, and W. Chapman. It should also be added that the duties of conductor have been shared by M. Seppilli, and that in addition to the operas above mentioned "Tannhäuser," "Faust," "Romeo and Juliet," "Carmen," "Lohengrin," "Cavalleria," "Pagliacci," "Maritana," and "The Bohemian Girl" have been mounted. A notice of the production of Mr. Hamish MacCunn's new opera, "Diarmid," will be found below.

MacCUNN'S NEW OPERA, "DIARMID."

Mr. Hamish MacCunn's new opera in four acts, entitled "Diarmid," was played for the first time in public on the 23rd ult., and will probably form the most memorable feature of this year's Royal Carl Rosa season at Covent Garden Theatre. The libretto, by the Marquis of Lorne, is based upon two Celtic ballads, the one dealing with a Norse invasion and the other with the loves of Diarmid and Grania. There is sufficient human motive in these two stories to provide ample material for an opera, but the author has added supernatural influences, which, although giving opportunity for a ballet and scenic effects, lessen rather than increase sympathy with the principal characters. In the first act Diarmid's prayer to the gods for strength to defeat the invading Norsemen is answered by the gift of invulnerability, save on the soles of his feet, whereupon Freya, the Norse Goddess of Love, in order to prevent her country from being conquered by Diarmid, immediately weaves a spell over him as he sleeps, and declares "All women who see thee shall straight be enamoured." The result of the latter embarrassing enchantment is that although Diarmid succeeds in driving back the Norsemen, his King's wife, Grania, insists upon following him wherever he goes. In the last act the couple are interrupted in a tête-à-tête by the King and his retainers, who are boar hunting. Diarmid is commanded to kill the boar and afterwards "to measure it with naked feet." In the performance of the latter part of his task his feet are pierced by the boar's bristles, which are poisoned, and the King, refusing to give the hero "the golden cup of healing," he dies "accurst."

Mr. MacCunn has boldly grappled with this exacting story, and opens his work with what may be termed an illustrated overture, it being played while King Fionn's warrior's return to their encampment after an unsuccessful attempt to repel the invasion of King Eragon and his Norsemen. When the Feinne begin to sing they do so in vigorous strains, piling up the while a wall of stones to make their camp more secure. This being accomplished, the music becomes more suave, and finally dies away pianissimo as the soldiers stretch themselves to sleep despite the warnings of Diarmid. Fionn's daughter, Eila, who is in love with Diarmid, tries to induce him to rest in a song of great melodic charm, and which proved the chief success of the performance. Diarmid, however, is in no mood for love-making, and somewhat curtly dismisses the love-lorn damsel. The music of the hero's subsequent appeal to the "Immortals . . . who stride in mists of glory by!" lacks breadth and dignity and is consequently somewhat disappointing, but the "Immortals" answer in four-part harmony and are succeeded by Freya and her numerous retinue, who, in melodious strains, weave the love-spell. Thus ends the first act, which manifestly created a highly favourable impression. In the next act the composer shows considerable dramatic perception in the duet between Fionn and his wife Grania, and there is much that is clever and effective in the music which accompanies the following battle scene; but, taken as a whole, the music in this act lacks distinction. The third act consists of two clearly divided portions. A ballet of fairies, hobgoblins, and gnomes, the music of which is extremely attractive, and a passionate duet between Grania and Diarmid, in which the former, under the influence of Freya's spell, overcomes the hero's very proper scruples. There is some graceful writing in the first part of the last act, and the duet, "The cherry and rowan," is very bright and pleasing, albeit it was taken so fast as to make the efforts of the singers almost ludicrous; but the end of the opera is, musically, the least impressive portion. From the above it will be gathered that Mr. MacCunn has been most successful when the situation demanded least, but for all that there is much cleverness in the work, which in its entirety displays great command of resources and considerable perception of the best means to an end. The characters of Grania and Eila were respectively embodied in a convincing manner by Madame Marie Duma and Miss Kirkby Lunn, both ladies singing excellently; and Mr. Brozel was duly fervent in the title-rôle. Miss Agnes Janson delivered Freya's spell most effectively, and the respective kings were severally personated by Mr. Maggi and Mr. Charles Tilbury. The ensemble was fairly good for a first night, and the composer (who conducted) and the author were twice called upon to acknowledge the applause.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

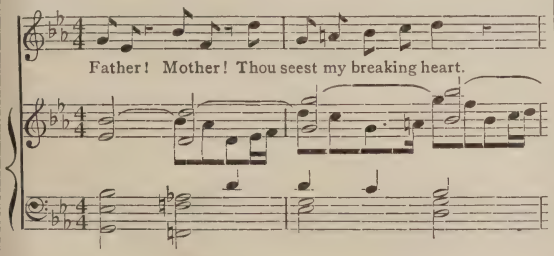
Verily, the ways of the London musical amateur are past finding out! Here was the greatest living conductor, Hans Richter, with his splendid orchestra, at Queen's Hall, on the 18th ult., offering a programme in which the last symphony of Brahms, played In Memoriam of the lamented master, was preceded by one of Tschaïkowsky's finest and maturest works—viz., his Suite, No. 3, in G (Op. 55)—Wagner's most beautiful, but, alas! already hackneyed "Charfreitagszauber" from "Parsifal," and Weber's brilliant "Euryanthe" Overture, and yet the hall was far from full. Is Richter too little sensational for present-day frequenters of orchestral concerts, or is the maddening toujours perdrix of Wagner extracts ruining their appetites and incapacitating them from partaking of any other musical food? To quote the remarks of C. A. B. in the analytical programme: "A pathetic interest attached to the choice of this Symphony of Brahms's for performance on the present occasion, seeing that it was the last of his works which the lamented great composer was privileged to listen to while here upon earth—viz., at a Concert of the Vienna Philharmonic Society, conducted by Dr. Hans Richter, on the 7th of March last." The E minor Symphony has always been considered one of the least spontaneous of Brahms's orchestral works, and so no doubt it is on the whole. Yet there are to be found rare beauties in its four movements: the Andante moderato is one of the noble master's most individual and moving efforts, while the final Passacaglia, a masterpiece of consummate musicianship, reveals fresh and beautiful secrets at every hearing. On the occasion under notice these sombre, almost tragic variations seemed a meet, as they were a touching, Requiem for the departed composer. Tschaïkowsky's Suite displays all his rare gifts: an inexhaustible flow of melody, generally expressive and distinguished, occasionally weak and sentimental, but always original; an equally inexhaustible supply of new orchestral effects of varying degrees of excellence; a wonderful command of rhythm, and altogether an exuberant, passionate imagination which, however, would have benefited by more self-criticism. This would have prevented the composer from penning such weak pages as those of the trio to the waltz, or the ppp march in the Scherzo. The orchestral effects there produced are clever and interesting enough, but to insist on them for page after page suggests a naïveté that is child-like and bland, not to say silly. The last of the very ingenious and frequently very beautiful variations, a Polacca, is also spun out to a wearying length. It occupies over fifty pages of the score! Still, the work deserves frequent hearings, and we must take it as we find it. Like the rest of the programme, the Suite was played with wonderful finish and expression, and even in the loudest passages the brass never degenerated into brutal noise such as we have heard—and heard frantically applauded—only too frequently of late.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The forty-second annual series of the Saturday concerts opened on the 9th ult., and while the programme offered nothing special in the way of novelty, interest attached to the occasion from the fact that since last season the Crystal Palace orchestra has been reconstituted, owing to the secession of a large number of the players engaged in former seasons. The motive for their withdrawal is, we understand, financial, and consequently does not fall within the scope of musical criticism, but one is free to express regret at the removal of so many familiar figures—many of them veterans—from the desks of the Sydenham concert-room. The results of the change are most markedly observable in the wind department, but, all things considered, a highly creditable start was made at the opening concert, when excellent performances were given of such test pieces as Schubert's great Symphony in C major—though Mr. Malsch was sadly missed in the lovely Andante—and in Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." M. Jacques Renard, the new leader of the violoncellos, made a very favourable impression in Saint-Saëns's Concerto for that instrument; Master Bruno Steindel, the newest pianoforte prodigy, was greatly applauded for his playing of two movements from Beethoven's G major Concerto and pieces by Bach, Chopin, and Schubert; and Madame Clara Samuell, who replaced Madame Marchesi—absent through indisposition—sang Handel's "Lusinghe più care" with her usual neatness and refinement.

Mr. German's symphonic poem "Hamlet," which was introduced to the Sydenham audience, under the composer's direction, at the concert of the 16th ult., is discussed in another column. It may suffice, therefore, to say that it was, in the main, well played by the Crystal Palace orchestra and very favourably received by the audience. Miss Maud MacCarthy, who made her début at these concerts, is a child violinist who plays with the intelligence and elegance of phrasing of an adult performer. Her rendering of Max Bruch's "Scottish" Fantasia (Op. 46) was a really satisfying performance—which can rarely be said of the efforts of juvenile executants—refined in conception, accurate in technique, and marked by an admirable sense of rhythm. Miss Clara Butt sang the familiar air from "Samson et Dalila," "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," and Mr. Liddle's commonplace, though not ineffective setting of "Abide with me," with her usual charm of voice, adding "In Scarlet Town" as an encore. Such a selection would be excellent for a ballad concert, but it suffered severely from juxtaposition with such numbers as Beethoven's C minor Symphony and the "Oberon" Overture, which completed the programme and were performed with great spirit under Mr. Manns's able and vigorous direction.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.



Mr. Robert Newman concluded, on the 16th ult., his third series of Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall. On that date he took his well-merited benefit concert, and the packed state of the spacious hall was a pleasing testimony of how greatly and how widely these performances have been appreciated. They now, indeed, form the chief artistic feature of early autumn musical life in London, and their influence in cultivating a taste for orchestral music of the highest class can scarcely be over-estimated. The excellence of Mr. Newman's orchestra has been frequently noticed in these columns, and the skill and progress of Mr. Henry J. Wood as a conductor dwelt upon. On these points there is little more to say, but there should be placed on record the production, on the 9th ult., of a clarinet concertino by Mr. Percy Pitt, whose compositions, it will be remembered, have been previously heard at these concerts. Mr. Pitt's concertino is based upon a few themes and some florid passages written by the famous clarinet player, Cavallini, which were brought to Mr. Pitt's notice by Mr. Manuel Gomez, first clarinettist of the Queen's Hall orchestra. These passages have been developed with remarkable skill and fertility of resource, and the solo part in particular proved so effective that the performance of the work, on the 9th ult., with Mr. Gomez as the soloist, elicited prolonged and enthusiastic applause.

QUEEN'S HALL SATURDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS.

Doubtless for some good reason Mr. Robert Newman has changed the name of his orchestral performances, hitherto known as "Symphony Concerts," to the less commodious title of "Queen's Hall Saturday Afternoon Concerts," and the first of the new series was given on the 23rd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Henry J. Wood. Few remarks are called for concerning this performance, for the programme was entirely devoted to Wagner, and its rendering does not call for detailed criticism. It should be stated, however, that Mr. Wood secured very fine readings of the majority of the excerpts, and particularly of the "Trauermarsch" from "Die Götterdämmerung," which was played with remarkable impressiveness. Miss Susan Strong was the vocalist, and sustained the reputation she has already acquired as a Wagnerian singer by dramatic interpretations of Elsa's dream, from "Lohengrin," and Isolde's "Liebestod."

HUMPERDINCK'S "KÖNIGSKINDER" ("ROYAL CHILDREN").

The chief feature of the fairy play "Königskinder" ("Royal Children"), an English version of which, entitled "The Children of the King," by Messrs. Carl Armbruster and John Davidson, was produced at the Court Theatre on the 13th ult., is the remarkable effort which Herr Humperdinck has made to cause his music to become an integral part of the libretto. To effect this each word of the text that is accompanied by music is set just as though it were intended to be sung. Not only is this method pursued with single voice parts, but when several characters are speaking in rapid succession or together their words are set out exactly as in an operatic chorus; the vocal parts in the riot at the end of the second act being eight in number. The nature of these vocal parts may be gathered from the following passage from the Goose-girl's prayer:—

In order to distinguish the vocal notes intended to be sung from those which are meant merely to indicate the rhythm and accent of the spoken words, the composer has given what he terms the Sprechnoten (speech-notes) heads shaped like a Maltese cross. Of course the music is based upon a series of Leitmotives. The principal theme, inasmuch as it is the most often heard, is that of the Goose-girl, which is as follows—

With this is associated—

—which is expressive of what may be termed her "castles in the air." Both these melodies are sung by the Goose-girl, but they are found chiefly in the orchestral portion of the score. The theme which next attracts attention is the Witch's spell motive—

—which is played as she forbids the Goose-girl to leave the forest.

The above notes are first heard as the Goose-girl, taking in her hand the loaf the Witch has forced her to make, says, "Whoever eats and wishes shall obtain his desire." Upon this blessing the Witch immediately casts a counter-spell, declaring that "Whoever eats the smallest crumb shall die."

Left alone, the Goose-girl bewails her fate while the music flows on in delicate and suggestive fashion. The arrival of the Prince, however, alters her views of life. He is heralded by—

—and as he declares his love for her there is heard from the orchestra—

Another noteworthy theme is that of the Goose-girl's garland, which is given out in its most complete form as the Prince puts the flowers next his heart. It runs thus—

Of the music really sung perhaps the most memorable is the song of the Minstrel, a gay and rollicking ditty, admirably suggestive of the good natured and vivacious character. Other snatches of song are equally melodious, but all these are of secondary importance, the orchestra being the principal means of musical expression. The above themes are treated with consummate mastery of contrapuntal resource, and the scoring is, for the most part, of extreme delicacy—manifestly with the purpose of not interfering with the distinctness of the spoken words. There is no overture in the score before us, the curtain being directed to be raised at the ninth bar, but the second and third acts are each preceded by a prelude of much musical interest. The first prelude is of a vigorous and lively nature, and includes an old German song, called "Kinder-Reigen" (Children's Round). The prelude to the last act is tragic in character and is headed "Verdorben-Gestorben" (Ruin-Death). It is chiefly built upon the Leitmotives, but it contains a section entitled the "Minstrel's last Song," which is sung by this character as the curtain rises. The music in this act is the most elaborate and beautiful of the work, and that which accompanies the efforts of the Goose-girl to cheer the Prince, and is heard as they eat the Witch's loaf and die, is most pathetic. Their death, as indicated in the German score, is the artistic ending of the work, but in the English version they come to life again and are proclaimed King and Queen by the children and some townsfolk of Hellabourne, who conveniently happen to be passing by. The most serious defect, however, of the English version is that little attempt seems to have been made to fit the words to the music. To do so would doubtless have been a very difficult task; but seeing the great pains the composer has taken to ensure unanimity of rhythm and accent in this particular, it is to be regretted more attention has not been given to this important matter. The original libretto, by Ernst Rosmer, the nom de plume of Mrs. Bernstein, is more acceptable than that adopted at the Court Theatre, but still, as presented, "The Children of the King" is a very charming play, full of human sentiment and instinct with poetic grace. Mr. Carl Armbruster, who conducted the first few performances, had been provided with an efficient orchestra, and great credit is due to him for the manner in which the music was played. Miss Cissie Loftus was a sympathetic exponent of the Goose-girl, and Miss Isabel Bateman was a good exponent of the Witch. Mr. Martin Harvey and Mr. Dion Boucicault respectively imparted much individuality to the characters of the Prince and the Minstrel, and the other parts were capably sustained.

It should be added that the title, "The Children of the King," adopted by Messrs. Armbruster and Davidson makes nonsense of the story, for if the Goose-girl and the Prince were "Children of the King" they could not marry. "Royal Children" gives most closely the meaning of the original German title.

MR. N. VERT'S CONCERTS.

According to the programmes of three concerts in St. James's Hall, announced by Mr. Vert, he is apparently of opinion that sufficient orchestral and classical chamber music is now being offered to the public, and that there are still many who better appreciate miscellaneous entertainments of the old-fashioned nature, composed of ballads leavened by operatic selections. He may be right, and at any rate there was a large audience at the first concert, on Saturday, the 16th ult., the encore nuisance setting in very early.

To enumerate all that was done would be impossible, but a few of the most successful pieces may be mentioned. In the aria from "Der Freischütz," popularly known as "Softly sighs," Miss Ella Russell achieved a triumph, and of course so did Mr. Santley in "O ruddier than the cherry," which he sings almost as effectively as ever. Among the other successful vocalists were Madame Bertha Rossow in Verdi's "Caro nome," Mr. Ben Davies in "Salve Dimora," and Madame Alice Gomez in a canzonetta, "La bella mea," from Schira's little known opera "Niccolo di l'Api." The vocal music was agreeably diversified by the violin solos contributed by M. Johannes Wolff. Of the remaining concerts we must speak in our next number.

MISS ANNA WILLIAMS'S FAREWELL CONCERT.

Few, if any, English soprano vocalists were ever regarded with greater respect than the artist who bade farewell to the public at the Albert Hall on Wednesday evening, the 13th ult. It was not only that Miss Williams was a good singer and an amiable woman, but she was invaluable to concert-givers by reason of her superb reading powers. Many a time she has come to the rescue when some other singer has disappointed at the last moment, reading with apparent ease a work that must have been strange to her. The most conspicuous instance of this occurred at the Birmingham Festival of 1888, when Miss Macintyre was incapacitated for two days. If it had not been for Miss Williams one trembles to think what would have occurred, for the scheme included, among other things, Professor Villiers Stanford's lengthy and difficult new oratorio "Eden"; but all went well, thanks, in great measure, to the heroism of her who, in the plenitude of strength, elects for reasons which doubtless are sufficient to rest on her laurels and be no more seen on the concert platform.

There was no cause for wonder that many artists of high rank proffered their services for the farewell, and that the general admirers of Miss Williams mustered in numbers sufficient to well fill the Albert Hall. Criticism on such an occasion is, of course, inadmissible, and therefore a few general remarks as to who appeared and what was done are all that can be recorded. The contributions of the bénéficiaire were "Angels, ever bright and fair," "Softly sighs," Mozart's "I will arise," with Madame Albani, and "Farewell," being a Lied by Schubert, with words by E. Baumer Williams, written especially for the occasion. Madame Albani, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, Mr. Frangcon-Davies, Mr. Plunket Greene, and Mr. Johannes Wolff gave the fullest satisfaction to the huge audience.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

This being a "Jubilee" year the concert given at the above flourishing institution, on the 20th ult., may perhaps also be referred to as a kind of "Jubilee," since it was the 250th students' concert since the foundation of the College. That the programme would contain a work by Brahms was to be expected, for nowhere has the music of the departed master been more assiduously cultivated than at the school in Kensington Gore. In fact, a College chamber concert would scarcely be complete without some piece by this composer, whose music never appears greater than if placed in juxtaposition with such a weak effusion as Dvorák's F major String Quartet (Op. 96), with its cheap nigger-tunes. Why is the chamber music of our own Parry, Stanford, Ashton, H. W. Davies, &c., ignored at the College in favour of such poor stuff as the Bohemian master's worst quartet? Merely because the gentlemen we have named are British and professors at the College? We confess these reasons do not appear sufficient to us. Perhaps Dr. Parry, the most British of our composers, will see to this! Brahms's Pianoforte Trio (the somewhat unduly neglected Op. 87, in C major) was played with a good deal of brilliancy and expression by John Ireland, Samuel Grimson, and P. Purcell Jones; the beautiful Scherzo especially went with great spirit and finish. Samuel Grimson made light of the terrible technical difficulties of Bach's "Chaconne." He has wonderful fingers has this lad, and we doubt whether the literature of violin music contains anything that he could not master; at any rate, as regards the written note. Whether he will in time to come excel in expression as he now excels in technique remains to be seen. Morfydd Williams essayed three songs by A. von Fielitz (Op. 15) without being altogether able to do justice to the somewhat peculiar German words or the equally peculiar, unsatisfactory music. Hester Hardman played Chopin's Barcarolle (Op. 60) with a great deal of physical strength but little charm, while Harry Dearth was heard in Miss White's song "The devout lover." He has an agreeable, flexible baritone voice, and he sang with considerable taste and feeling, though the accompaniment was played in a slovenly, irritating manner. The executants in Dvorák's Quartet were Mary Noverre, Barré Squire, Edward Behr, and Robert Grimson, and they gave a fair performance of the disappointing work.

REVIEWS.

The Westminster Abbey Hymn Book, with Tunes. Compiled and arranged under the musical editorship of Frederick Bridge. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Although some years have elapsed since the issue of the "words" edition of the Westminster Abbey Hymn Book, its musical complement will be none the less welcome on that account. The book before us contains upwards of 400 tunes. The majority of those old tunes which have become deep-rooted in the affections of worshippers of all denominations rightly find a place in these pages, though we miss that fine eighteenth-century tune "Bedford." "Miles's Lane," one of the last surviving of the old "repeat" tunes, is duly preserved. Its melody is happily not altered as in "Hymns Ancient and Modern"; but we hope that no organist will think it "desirable" to avail himself of the permission to omit half of the familiar refrain of Shrubsole's tune.

But the chief interest in the book will naturally be centred in the new tunes, of which there are over one hundred. Two of these (Nos. 156 and 173), both in the key of G and hitherto unpublished, are by Gounod, and are written in the diatonic and melodious style of the old composers. The editor, Sir Frederick Bridge, contributes twelve tunes from his prolific pen. One (No. 32) is partly in chant form. Another, to the words "From Egypt's bondage come," has a fine unison phrase at the words "Hallelujah!" His beautiful setting of Dean Milman's words, "Brother, thou art gone before us," specially composed for the funeral service of his friend and fellow chorister Joseph Maas, the effect of which the present writer so well remembers on that sad occasion, worthily finds a place. Sir Frederick's setting to the words "From Greenland's icy mountains" is appropriately named "Nansen"! In his tune to "When the weary, seeking rest," he has, in the refrain, introduced "Open the heavens," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," but in triple time. Of the five tunes contributed by Sir John Stainer, that to Mrs. Alexander's charming words, "All things bright and beautiful," is bound to become a favourite. It is an ideal children's tune. Another tune by Sir John, to "Through the day Thy love has spared us," is a delightful setting of an evening hymn.

We do not remember to have seen the name of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen as a writer of hymn-tunes before; but here are six specimens from his pen, of which No. 289 is a capital unison tune to "Brightly gleams our banner," having a splendid marching swing, which fully entitles Mr. Cowen to step at once into the front rank of modern hymn-tune composers. The "chief musicians" of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music are also contributors. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who was formerly a choirmaster in a Presbyterian Church in Edinburgh, is represented by two effective tunes (Nos. 146 and 155), and Dr. Hubert Parry by four, of which that to the words "Praise the Rock of our salvation" is an effective festival hymn. The name of the organist of St. Paul's Cathedral is very properly found in the Westminster Abbey book. Of Sir George Martin's three contributions, the tune named "Rudgwick," set to "Songs of thankfulness and praise," is very bold and spirited. The late Sir Joseph Barnby wrote five tunes for the book, which are sure to find acceptance by reason of their intrinsic merit and appropriateness to the words to which they are mated. Nos. 13 and 398, by Barnby, show the versatility of his styles as a hymn-tune composer.

The Rev. Canon Hervey has a fine bold tune, named "Lochnagar," to the words "Who are these, like stars appearing," which is sure to become a favourite. By no means the least attractive contribution to this varied collection is a fine martial tune, melodious and majestic, by Mr. J. H. Maunder, to the words "Forward! be our watchword." We shall be greatly surprised if this stirring melody is not in great request for the service books of choral festivals; the choirs would simply revel in singing it. Two beautiful tunes by Dr. Henry Hiles, to Adelaide Procter's "The shadows of the evening hours" and Mrs. Alexander's "The roseate hues of early dawn," reflect the beauty of these two evening hymns. The tune by the late Dr. Garrett (No. 29, 2nd tune), which is first printed in these pages, was written twenty years ago in Devonshire, where Garrett was sojourning with his old pupil, Canon Hervey, of Sandringham. Three tunes by the Rev. J. B. Dykes (Nos. 129, 2nd tune; 252, 2nd tune; and 384), from the "Anglican Hymn Book," very properly find a place in this collection.

Amongst the various other composers who have contributed to the book, we find such well-known names as Dr. Keeton, the late Dr. W. H. Monk (who wrote one tune), Mr. Myles B. Foster, Dr. Harford Lloyd, Dr. Joseph Bridge, Mr. John E. West (who contributes seven excellent tunes), Mr. Gerard F. Cobb, Mr. Battison Haynes, Mr. W. S. Hoyte, Mr. Berthold Tours, Mr. J. Clippingdale (who has written five tunes), Mr. W. Alcock, sub-organist of the Abbey, and many other "good men and true." We trust that we have sufficiently sampled the contents of this latest hymnal to induce clergymen, organists, and choir-masters to examine it for themselves. A very important feature of any book is the department of the index. For this we have nothing but praise to offer. There are no less than four indexes, under the headings "general," "metres," "authors and translators," and "composers," all of which are admirably done. The last word must be one of congratulation to Sir Frederick Bridge, the distinguished occupant of the organist's seat at the Abbey, who has discharged the duties of musical editor with consummate skill.

An Album of Twelve Hush-Songs. Composed by Alicia Adélaïde Needham. [Boosey and Co.]

This is a very charming volume, and Mrs. Needham's best effort so far. By collecting twelve "Hush-Songs" in one book the composer ran the obvious risk of becoming monotonous to soporiferousness, and it shows confidence in her own powers that she did not shrink from a task which might have appalled a musician of the highest gifts and most pronounced individuality. But we are bound to admit that no charge of monotony can be laid at her door. Mrs. Needham has chosen her poems very carefully. They are all real poetry, not merely "words for music," and the variety of sentiment and spirit to be found in them has been happily reflected in the music. The late Eugene Field, of Chicago, is represented by no less than five poems, and in setting these, Mrs. Needham has been especially happy. Her music to "Little blue pigeon," the ever-fresh "Wynken, Blynken, and Nod," and "The fairy's lullaby," is not unworthy of Sir Arthur Sullivan in his most captivating "Savoy" mood for rhythmical tunefulness, and that exact fitting of tune to poem which seems to exclude the possibility of any other good setting of that same poem being written. Tunefulness is, in fact, our composer's strongest feature, and one which we welcome most heartily. Hers are generally real tunes which easily stand the test of being sung unaccompanied, yet they never degenerate into drivel. A serious note is struck in such poems as Eugene Field's "My harp is on the willow tree" and Dr. J. A. Goodchild's "The first-born." Both these songs are expressive in an unaffected, direct way, while, on the other hand, a negro lullaby, "Croodlin' doo," with its swinging, catchy tune, is of the essence of jollity, and has every chance of obtaining the widest popularity. Those who look in this volume for specimens of the highest type of art songs (Lieder), created by the great German masters, will do so in vain. Mrs. Needham has not yet arrived at the perfection of workmanship necessary for their production, nor is her gift of expression sufficiently developed, her sentiment being occasionally slightly suggestive of sentimentality. But judged by the standard of the better class of English songs, these "Hush-Songs" may be warmly praised. They have given us genuine pleasure, and we doubt not that they will find many admirers. All those qualities are found in them, but in a much more artistic form, that have made her "Irish Lullaby" one of the most popular songs of the last decade. The volume is adorned with a very charming frontispiece by Mr. Robert Sauber.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Nos. 760-777. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The latest additions to this collection of Part-songs are before us. "The West winds, ho!" (No. 760), by W. McKendrick, is a bright and vigorous setting of some suggestive lines by Thomas George Cox. In No. 761 Dr. Herbert W. Wareing has taken for his text Shakespeare's song "When daffodils begin to peer." The vocal parts possess considerable independence, and, well rendered, the composition would be very effective. No. 762 is Sir Frederick Bridge's stirring patriotic song "Hurrah! Hurrah! for England," the merits of which have already been commented upon in these columns. A "Hymn to Music," by Dudley Buck, which forms No. 763, is of a somewhat elaborate and ambitious character, and will provide well trained choirs with legitimate opportunities for the display of those qualities which distinguish finished and high-class choral singing. No. 764 is "The Queen's Song," by Eaton Faning, which has won wide acceptance during the recent jubilee celebrations. Nos. 765 to 772, and 775, 776 are settings by Dr. Hubert Parry, which were noticed as forming two collections in the August issue of The Musical Times. It may, however, be useful for purposes of reference to give the numbers of each in this series. No. 765 is "Since thou, O fondest"; No. 776, "Music, when soft voices die"; No. 767, "How sweet the answer"; No. 768, "What voice of gladness"; No. 769, "Whether men do laugh or weep"; No. 770, "Tell me, O love"; No. 771, "Follow your saint"; No. 772, "Love is a sickness"; No. 775, "The sea hath many a thousand sands"; No. 776, "Turn all thy thoughts to eyes." No. 773, which consists of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's spirited partiotic song "All hail the glorious reign," has already been noticed in these columns, as also has No. 778, which is Sir Frederick Bridge's arrangement of the National Anthem with the acceptable and excellent second verse by the Dean of Rochester. In No. 774 will be found a graceful and expressive lullaby entitled "Rest thee, my little one," by Thomas Facer, and No. 777 is a clever and expressive setting, by Arthur Berridge, of Edmund Spencer's philosophical lines "Every sweet with sour is tempered."

Six Pastoral Part-Songs. By Edward Bunnett.
Gauzy Wings. Part-song for S.A.T.B. Words by Florence Hoare. Music by Richard Richards.
The Milking Song. Words by Jean Ingelow. Music by J. Jobling.
Nymphs of the Ocean. Words by Florence Hoare. Music by W. W. Pearson.
Serenade. For Male Chorus. By Frank Davidson.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Dr. Bunnett's church music is widely known to choirmasters by reason of its melodiousness and simple but effective part-writing. These qualities are conspicuous in the "Six Pastoral Part-Songs," or at least in the four of them severally named "O'er silvery waters," "Day is dawning," "Sing on, sweet birds," and "Lo, autumn leaves." They are specially suited to small amateur choral societies.

"Wings" in the musical firmament always beat in 6-8 time, and Mr. Richards's "Gauzy" specimens obey the unwritten law. The measure lends itself to graceful melodiousness, which is the chief characteristic of this part-song.

"The Milking Song" is taken from the ballad entitled "The high tide on the coast of Lincolnshire, 1571," and in the poem the song is supposed to be sung by a solo voice, but musicians, as well as poets, have their licenses, and Mr. Jobling has set it for four voices. The music is pretty, but the forte and piano effects have no rational basis and have been inserted merely for the sake of effect, and consequently fail to be convincing.

In "Nymphs of the Ocean" the spirit of the words has been neatly caught by the composer, and the part-song is distinctly bright and pleasing.

Mr. Davidson's Serenade is a cleverly written piece, such as a well trained quartet party would find much interest in singing. It merits the attention of male-voice choirs and glee singers.

If only my lover knew. Song. Words by Maude Hammond. Music by James R. Dear.
[Robert Cocks and Co.]

The above is a sympathetic little song which may be recommended to mezzo-soprano vocalists of average attainments. The heroine has said "No" when she ought to have said Yes," not an uncommon procedure; and the plaintive nature of her regrets make one hope that her lover may have had sufficient experience to know that "maids in modesty say 'No' to that which they would have the profferer construe 'Aye.'" The music is unpretentious but melodious, and the vocal part is grateful to the singer.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. Nos. 568-573, 578, 579.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Recent additions to this valuable series show the usual variety and style. In No. 568 the Gloria from the Twelfth Mass, commonly attributed to Mozart, has been furnished with English words of thanksgiving. No. 569, "O come, let us sing," composed by Myles B. Foster, is described as "An easy Easter anthem for bass solo and chorus," which indicates the character of the music. The bass solo is well laid out for that voice and occupies two pages of the anthem. Mr. Foster has also provided Nos. 571 and 573, respectively entitled "Is it nothing to you" and "The eyes of all wait upon Thee." The first composition is appropriate for Holy Week and the second is a Harvest anthem for soprano solo and chorus. Both are excellent examples of this musician's genial style, and may be recommended to the attention of choirmasters. No. 570 is the anthem "Blessed be the Lord thy God which delighted in thee," specially composed by Sir Frederick Bridge for the fiftieth anniversary of the Queen's Accession, and sung at the Jubilee service in Westminster Abbey on June 21, 1887. The festival Te Deum, together with the Antiphon written by Sir George C. Martin for the memorable Thanksgiving service at St. Paul's Cathedral on June 22 last, forms No. 572. Criticism of this is unnecessary, for its artistic value has been widely recognised; but choirmasters who have not seen the music will do well to make its acquaintance, for the setting of the Te Deum is admirably suited for festival services and presents no difficulties beyond the abilities of a well-trained choir. Nos. 578 and 579 are Harvest anthems, the former composed by Bruce Steane and the latter by Bertram Luard Selby. Mr. Steane's anthem opens with a brief bass solo and contains another short passage for this voice, but with these exceptions the anthem is written in the usual four vocal parts, which are extremely flowing and melodious. Mr. Selby's contribution contains a duet or semi-chorus for soprano and tenor of considerable musical interest, and the anthem throughout shows the hand of an accomplished musician.

Ye Jacobites by Name. Words by Robert Burns.
The Farewell. Words by Robert Burns.
Hymn before Action. Words by Rudyard Kipling.
The Lawlands o' Holland. Old Ballad.
A Song of Innocence. Words by William Blake.
Music by H. Walford Davies.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Walford Davies is one of the most promising of our young composers. There is a healthy manliness in his music, which is at once inspiring and inspiriting, and his sentiment is free from all traces of maudlin sentimentality. These characteristics distinguish his settings of "Ye Jacobites by name" and "The Farewell," and the words of the Scotch poet have rarely been allied to more sympathetic music. Both of these compositions are suitable for a bass or baritone voice. The "Hymn before Action" is also written for a baritone, but in a note the composer says: "This hymn is intended to be sung by many male voices in unison, except in the second verse, which may well be sung as a solo." However rendered, if delivered with due spirit, the hymn would have a most stirring effect. "The Lawlands o' Holland" may be recommended to the attention of contralto singers. The words of devotion to a lost love are set in a simple but expressive style which accentuates their pathos, and a sympathetic vocalist could make this song very charming. "A Song of Innocence" gives proof of the composer's versatility, the simple nature of the lines being allied to music which happily illustrates their character. It would be most effectively sung by a mezzo-soprano vocalist.

Weekes and Co.—Pianists who take delight in studies for their instrument will find good employment for their fingers in A Concert Study in C minor, by Arthur Somervell.——Appealing to a larger number of players are Three Characteristic Pieces in dance form, by H. J. Taylor, severally named "Egyptian," "Grecian," and "Roman." To what kind of music the Egyptians danced would doubtless exercise the ingenuity of antiquaries to describe, but Mr. Taylor seems to have no doubt on the subject, and although the "Egyptian Dance" might surprise the East it will prove acceptable in the West. The inhabitants of Greece are represented by a graceful measure, and "ff" and "sf" are prominent in the Roman Dance.——Six Bagatelles for the Pianoforte, by Mrs. Robert Bruce, are well named. They are trifles, but pleasing.——Ten short Sketches for the Pianoforte, by C. A. Ehrenfechter, are somewhat similar in character to the preceding, but require a more advanced player.——A brilliant little piece will be found in an Impromptu in D flat, by Julian Pascal.——An Ode to Music. For tenor solo, voices, and orchestra. Words by Florence Hoare. Music by Myles B. Foster. The text of this work is somewhat ambitious in conception but it is poetic in character, and the lines afford admirable opportunities for variety of musical illustration. Mr. Foster has not failed to note these, and his setting is consequently free from the monotony which sometimes makes itself unpleasantly felt in compositions for male voices. The music also combines geniality with the touch of dignity called for by the subject.——No Land like England. Chorus for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, from the music to "The Foresters"

(Tennyson). Composed by Courtenay Gale. Tennyson's optimistic lines are set in this part-song with a directness and vigour which are calculated to stir the patriotic pulse of the most pessimistic listener.——I love my Love in the morning. Words anonymous. Music by J. Varley Roberts. This is a melodious and smoothly written part-song wherein the smitten one gives his reasons why he loves his sweetheart in the morning, in the afternoon, and in the evening, the said reasons being flattering to the lady and manifestly satisfactory to himself.

Metzler and Co.—Prison. Song. Written by Paul Verlaine. English translation by Adela Maddison. Evening. Song. Written by Albert Samain. English words by Adela Maddison. Composed by Gabriel Fauré. These two songs are a good example of M. Fauré's graceful and finished style. In both, however, the shades of evening seem to have caused the composer to indulge in vagueness of tonality, and this has resulted in such a bountiful sprinkling of accidentals that at first sight the music suggests the reverse of the repose which is commonly associated with the close of the day, and the accompanist who, without mishap, gets through the "Evening" ditty, will doubtless feel that there has been "something attempted, something done."——Smiles and Tears. Written by Julien Houba. English words by Paul England. Composed by Edmund Depret. This is a good specimen of the modern French amorous lyric. It is essentially a tenor song, but, doubtless, will be sung by ladies. ——Menuet de la Reine. By Benjamin Godard. The characteristics of the famed dance are pleasantly set forth in this piece by the late French composer.——Serenade and Barcarolle. For Violin and Pianoforte. By André Messager. The difference in character between a Serenade and Barcarolle might be described as that which exists between the sentiment of the timid lover and the one who commands. This definition will at least serve to indicate the nature of the above two pieces, both of which are effectively laid out for the violin, and also contain some interesting passages for the pianoforte.

Edwin Ashdown.—Beanstalk Suite. For the pianoforte. By Arthur Somervell. This consists of five short pieces in old dance form, severally an Allemande, Sarabande, Gavotte, Musette, and Gigue, which are preceded by a Prelude. They are dedicated "To all my pupils not yet in their teens," and are slightly progressive in executive demands. The title "Beanstalk" must not be taken as a poetic basis for Mr. Somervell's work, it being merely suggestive of the continuous effort necessary alike to the young student and Jack the Giant-killer to ensure success. ——Under the title of Irish Pictures, Mr. Barry M. Gilholy has written for the pianoforte, in simple but effective manner, four pieces based on Irish subjects.——A Notturno in C minor, by Mr. Edward E. Harper, is a graceful and expressive example of its class.——Vocalists who like a song with a story in it will find a pathetic little ditty in The Torn Flag, words by Marian Burnside, music by Mary Augusta Salmond; and Mr. Arthur Cecil has set with some skill Bret Harte's ballad "The Wind in the Chimney."——Cyril's Song, from "The silence of Dean Maitland," has been allied to graceful music by John Hill, who also has provided a setting of considerable merit of Shelley's well known lines "Music, when soft voices die."

History of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society. By Andrew Deakin (Birmingham: Cornish Brothers). A very interesting pamphlet of fifty-two pages by the veteran musical critic, written in the pleasing and attractive style for which he has been so long and so favourably known. The booklet also contains some notices of the rise and progress of chorus singing in Midland towns.——Choral Associations: their aims and objects. By T. Roylands-Smith (Plymouth: "Church in the West" Office). This contains the substance of a paper read at the annual conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Edinburgh in January last. Mr. Roylands-Smith speaks with all the authority of long experience as a diocesan choir-master, fired with a zeal which is truly commendable. There are some capital hints and reflections in this little brochure. ——L'Organo della Cattedrale di Cremona. By Federico Sacchi (Ricordi). An interesting reprint of some articles, which recently appeared in the Gazzetta Musicale of Milan, giving a history of the organ in the Cathedral of Cremona, a place which is so eminently associated with the great masters of violin makers. Those who can read Italian will doubtless enjoy perusing these instructive pages.——Some leading Organists (Church Newspaper Co., Ltd.). Like the foregoing, this pamphlet, in its bright red cover, is also a reprint. In this case the articles originally appeared in Church Bells. Here are biographical sketches, with portraits, of twenty church organists more or less known to fame, headed by the veteran Dr. W. H. Longhurst, organist of Canterbury Cathedral. The sketches, if slight, are written in a pleasant manner, and will doubtless prove of interest to many "chief musicians" in "quires and places where they sing" and play.——Richard Wagner's Prose Works. Translated by W. Ashton Ellis. Vol. VI., Part 2. (Kegan Paul). This instalment of a valuable contribution to musical literature contains the following essays: "The public in time and space," "The Festivals of 1876" (when Bayreuth was inaugurated), and an instalment of "Shall we hope?" Of these the second-named is of special interest, considering that so many pilgrims now resort to the shrine of Wagner. It need scarcely be said that the difficult task of translating Wagner's diction is, as heretofore, admirably discharged by the indefatigable Mr. Ashton Ellis.

Christmas Music.—Four Christmas Carols. By Herbert C. Morris. (Novello, Ewer and Co.) Those who prefer new carols to old may be recommended this collection. The music is melodious, and albeit some of the dissonances are extreme, having regard to the subject-matter, the harmonies will be acceptable to "advanced" ears. The Babe of Bethlehem. By Frank Adlam. (Hart and Co.) This is described as "A short and easy carol-cantata for Christmas and Epiphany," and it consists of a series of carols interspersed with recitatives and airs which are laid out for various voices. The music is tuneful, in the popular acceptation of the word, moderate in vocal compass, and simple in character. Glory to God in the Highest. Anthem for Christmas. By the Rev. E. Vine Hall. (Weekes and Co.) The composer of this anthem has taken the two first sentences of the "Gloria in Excelsis" and the first verse of the hymn "O come, all ye faithful," and set them in a simple but effective manner in four vocal parts with an accompaniment for organ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MISS C. A. BIRCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your September number you commented on the biographer who prematurely announced the death of Sam Wesley by a trifle of twenty-two years; and in the October number you cited the case of Sir F. Ouseley, who was credited with having departed this life twenty-three years too soon.

I find an error in "British Musical Biography," by Brown and Stratton, of equal magnitude, where I read: "Charlotte Ann Birch, soprano vocalist, was born in London in 1815, and died there in 1857. She sang chiefly at London and provincial concerts." Miss Birch, I am happy to say, still lives. I received a letter from her only yesterday, and I would like to remind your readers that for many years she was one of the solo vocalists engaged by the Sacred Harmonic Society. I have lying before me a programme of the memorable 23rd of April, 1847, the occasion of the second performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in its revised and permanent form; the composer conducted, the Queen and Prince Consort were amongst the auditors, and Miss C. A. Birch sang the principal soprano solo music.—Yours, &c.

ANALYTICAL PROGRAMMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Referring to my article on the above subject in your September issue (p. 573), I have received a letter from Mr. Robert A. Marr, of Edinburgh, together with a copy of his book "Music for the People." In the Introduction to the latter (p. lxxxvii.), he states that "It was at this period [1836] that John Thomson, afterwards first Reid Professor of Music at the University, commenced to write what are believed to be the first published analytical programmes. They were small 12mo leaflets of four pages. 'Brief Notices of the Music to be performed by the Professional Society on 3rd March, 1838,' is the title of the earliest one seen by the writer." I at once wrote to Mr. Marr, asking him whether he could possibly let me see some of these earlier programmes. He kindly lent me eight of these "Brief Notices," dated March 3 (incomplete), April 28, 1838, and February 2, 23, March 2, 30, April 20, and May 4, 1839. In the "Brief Notices" of April 28 readers are referred back to that of November 11, 1837, for a "complete exposition of the style and character" of Spohr's Symphony in F, "The Birth of Music."

But I find that there must have been still earlier "Brief Notices." In an account of the third concert of the Edinburgh Professional Society (formed in 1836), in the Musical World of February 24, 1837, and reprinted from the Edinburgh Observer, there appears the following: "The idea of preparing 'Brief Notices' of the Instrumental Music selected for performance at the concerts, for the use of the Associates during the rehearsals, is one of so useful a nature that we regret it was not sooner acted upon."

The expression "for the use of the Associates during the rehearsals" deserves particular notice. It is difficult to do two things well at the same time; difficult to listen to music and attempt to analyse it simultaneously, as concert-goers often try to do when some work is performed for the first time. Why, then, should not concert programme-books be on sale a week before the concert takes place? But to return to my subject.

The Musical World reprints Edinburgh Observer notices of the first and second concerts of the Professional Society, yet without mention of any "Brief Notices." In the first notice, however, the writer refers to the rehearsal of Beethoven's Symphony in C at the London Philharmonic Society, and relates the story mentioned in my "Analytical Programmes," as I found it in a later programme. I, therefore, conclude that the writer of this first notice had before him a "Brief Notice."

In the eight "Brief Notices" which Mr. Marr has sent me there are two or three matters of interest, to which, if not trespassing too much on your valuable space, I should like to refer as briefly as possible.

In a notice of the "Eroica" we read:—

"The second movement represents the last scene of a warrior's career. There is the profoundly solemn march—the high service in the cathedral, with a fine fugal point given out by the violins—the fading away of the receding procession, to the last dropping notes (pp) denoting the completion of the solemnity. Then follows the Scherzo, descriptive of the military returning home 'with merry march to the tent-royal' of their new chief."

This picturesque account of the middle movements of the "Eroica" is quite in the spirit of the admirable notices of the Beethoven Symphonies by Sir George Grove.

For the "Practice" on May 4, 1839, Mozart's "Grand Symphony" (No. 2) in D major (Köch. Cat., No. 504) was the chief feature of the programme; and concerning that work Mr. Thomson gives some very interesting particulars as told to him by Thomas Attwood:—

"There is an anecdote connected with this portion of the movement (i.e., of the Allegro) which, as it is authentic, is interesting. Mr. Attwood (the late distinguished composer to the Queen), who narrated it to the writer of these papers, was a pupil of Mozart's at the time this symphony was composed. Mozart had the conduct of a series of concerts at Leipzig [? Vienna], which took place every alternate Monday evening. It was his custom to write something new, such as a symphony or other orchestral piece, for each concert; and for one of these he commenced the symphony in question. Attwood, who absolutely adored his master, was of course anxiously watching its progress, but was in an agony to find that Mozart had not, by the Thursday previous to the concert, reached beyond the middle bar of the first movement, although he had written most part of the other movements. Mozart, passionately fond of billiards, was very impatient of advice, and therefore it was with no small fear and trembling that his anxious pupil ventured to hint at the delay of the symphony. Mozart paid little heed to the hint, merely saying he would be in time. Attwood was in despair, till, on going to him on the Sunday forenoon, he found the floor covered with music paper flung down as it was used and Mozart in high spirits, just finishing the last few bars of the movement. Mozart explained that so many modes of treatment presented themselves, he had been allowing the phrases (above alluded to) to float about in his mind until he was satisfied as to which was best, and then he had no difficulty in making them assume the permanent form in which they now appear."

It is interesting to read, at the end of the "Brief Notices" of April 28, 1838, the following remarks of the analyst:—

"The writer of these papers has reason to know that his exertions have not been altogether in vain. If he has indeed been successful in originating or stimulating among any of the Associates a relish for the classical works of the great masters, he has only to assure them that he will not relax in his endeavours to render the 'Brief Notices' of next season equally intelligible and useful."

Yours truly,

J. S. Shedlock.

A SUGGESTION TO MUSIC PUBLISHERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I should like to make the following suggestion to music publishers through the medium of your columns: that they print on the title-page of the music of the classic composers the year of birth and death—thus: Hungarian Dances, &c., Brahms (1833-1897)—the time at which the composer lived would then be constantly impressed upon the mind of the musical student.

I am not aware that this has ever been done, and think it may be worthy of notice.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

Prelude.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The financial result of the Triennial Musical Festival is more satisfactory than was anticipated at first, and the General Hospital will probably benefit by it to the amount of £5,000. As the musical part of the festival is specially dealt with in this number of The Musical Times, there is no need for me to cover the same ground.

The musical Matinées in connection with the Royal Birmingham Society of Artists were inaugurated on the 9th ult., under the best possible auspices. There will be ten Matinées during the season, for which Mr. Oscar Pollack, the musical director, has secured some of the best vocalists and instrumentalists in the Midlands as well as a number of well-known glee quartets.

The first of a series of Promenade concerts was given at the Curzon Hall on the 11th ult. The promoters are Mr. Ffrench Davis, Mr. F. Beard, and Mr. George Halliley, well known local musicians, who have endeavoured to frame these concerts after the style and upon the scale of the London Promenade Concerts. There is an orchestra of about sixty performers. Madame Alice Gomez and Mr. Charles Manners were the principal vocalists at the initial performance, and created quite a furore by their impressive singing. Messrs. Davis and Beard act as conductors and Mr. George Halliley as accompanist.

The Midland Musical Society gave a performance of Haydn's "Creation," in the Town Hall, on the 16th ult., with band, chorus, organ, and the following principals: Miss Ethel Locker, Mr. Samuel Roper, and Mr. William Evans, with Mr. C. W. Perkins at the organ. Mr. H. M. Stevenson conducted. The higher or old Philharmonic pitch was adopted to suit the wood-wind, and Mr. Perkins had to transpose the organ part a semitone higher. The chorus, which is composed of amateurs, is not deficient in tone power, but is hardly properly balanced, owing to the want of more tenors and basses.

The Festival Choral Society's thirty-eighth concert series begins on the 11th inst. with a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The scheme for the season will include Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Bach's "O Light Everlasting," Elgar's "King Olaf," Mendelssohn's "Loreley," and three grand orchestral concerts.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Musical activity is just commencing after a long period of stagnation. The many choral societies in the city and neighbourhood are busily rehearsing for future performances and sundry concerts of a minor character have taken place. On the 12th ult. the festival of Parish Choirs of Bristol was celebrated in the Cathedral, when sixteen churches sent contingents to form the united choir. Tallis's Preces and Responses were used, the Psalms were sung to chants by J. W. Elliott in B flat and Dr. S. S. Wesley in F, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Goss in E. The anthem was Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank's "O sing unto the Lord." The hymns were "At His word," to an ancient plain-song; "The sower went forth," to Sir Frederick Bridge's tune in C; "Holy, holy, holy," to Dr. Crotch's setting in D; and "Round the sacred city," to Dr. Hubert Parry's tune in G. Mr. John Barrett was the conductor and Mr. A. E. Hill presided at the organ.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

There are signs of increased activity in East Anglia. Many of the local societies have resumed their weekly practices. The Norwich Festival Committee have put into rehearsal the concert edition of Gounod's "Faust," which will be given early in December. This will be a novelty and the result will be watched with interest.

Among past events the first place must be given to a concert organised by Mr. Ernest Harcourt, to aid the fund being raised to build a new "Jenny Lind" Infirmary for children in Norwich, the present building having become inadequate for its purpose. A band and chorus of 200 performers discharged their part of the programme in a highly successful manner. Madame Clara Samuell met with a flattering reception and Mr. S. Hemming artistically rendered some songs. The violin solos of Mr. Richard Gompertz were delightfully rendered and Mr. Kingston Rudd's pianoforte playing was, as usual, a clever display of artistic skill.

The annual concert in aid of the Norwich district of the Railway Guards' Universal Friendly Society was given in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 21st ult., before a very large and enthusiastic audience. The principal vocalists included Madame Kate Cove, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Dalgetty Henderson, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford, whose songs were nearly all encored. Miss Cecile Elieson showed herself a skilful and accomplished violinist. The pianist was Miss Maud Rihll, whose playing gave the greatest satisfaction. The musical arrangements were in the hands of Mr. Hodgson Craig.

A lecture on the life and works of John Sebastian Bach was given at Ipswich, on the 7th ult., by Miss Paget, with musical illustrations.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The musical season was opened, on the 16th ult., by the first of Messrs. Paterson's concerts, at which the Meister Glee Singers were the chief attraction. This delightful quartet appear to have paid the penalty of sustained popularity and exhaustive study of a very restricted field, for their old songs are much over-elaborated in treatment and the novelties in their répertoire are very weak. Their contributions to the programme were received with enthusiasm and demands for encores. Mrs. Helen Trust sang the Shadow song from "Dinorah" and a Lullaby which earned an encore. Instrumental pieces were interpreted by M. Hollman and by Madame Frickenhaus, who showed genuine artistic qualities in her solos and played the various accompaniments exceptionally well.

At the first of Messrs. Methven and Simpson's winter concerts, on the 18th ult., Miss Ella Pancera more than justified the rumours of her phenomenal technique. She was most warmly received by a large audience. Her interpretations of modern compositions were happier than those of Beethoven's "Appassionata" and Chopin's Third Sonata.

It is not often that space can be found in this column for organ recitals, but an exception must be made for the opening of a Lewis organ in St. George's, the most important Free Church in Edinburgh. The Free Church withstood the spirit of the age as long as possible, but it has had to give in, and it is quite possible that John Knox himself, not to mention Dr. Chalmers, would to-day have acquiesced in the inevitable—although, perhaps, "Vorspiel to Parsifal (by desire)" might have awakened their misgivings. The offer of a very handsome salary attracted numerous applicants for the post at Free St. George's, from among whom the committee chose Mr. Alfred Hollins, organist and choirmaster of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Upper Norwood, London. Mr. Hollins gave an inaugural recital on the 11th ult., with a programme which was more calculated to display the beautiful "fancy" stops of the organ than his own undoubted and well-known distinction as an organist. The instrument, with an inadequate pedal organ, is too small for the church, and, moreover, is under the further disadvantage of being placed in two stone chambers specially built for it on each side of the pulpit, the apertures of which display, as on the ledge of a window, 34 pipes, and these alone, out of 1,358 pipes in all, speak directly into the building. Truly St. George's Free Church has chosen to hide its costly candle under a bushel! It should be added that half-an-hour before the time announced for the recital the building was so crowded that the doors had to be shut and hundreds were unable to obtain admittance.

The historical concerts arranged by Professor Niecks in connection with the Chair of Music at the Edinburgh University are five in number, and, as in former years, present features both novel and important. At the first two the choir of St. Mary's Cathedral, under Mr. Collinson, will perform a representative selection from the works of great English Cathedral composers. At the third concert the programme will be drawn from the unfamiliar répertoire of chamber music written for wind instruments and pianoforte. The last two concerts will be devoted to "virtuosic violin music from Corelli to the present day." The classes and courses of lectures arranged by the Faculty of Music under the Reid Bequest comprise lectures on musical history and musical form, and classes in harmony, advanced harmony, counterpoint, and composition.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

The Glasgow Choral Union and the Scottish Orchestra Company's prospectus for the coming season announces that eleven classical concerts (nine orchestral and two choral) and nine popular orchestral concerts in St. Andrew's Hall will be given. The directors have decided to make a considerable reduction in the rate of subscription per concert, which will hardly fail to secure a large and desirable increase in the number of subscribers. The vocalists already engaged include Misses Marie Brema, Ada Crossley, and Florence Oliver; Messrs. Ben Davies, Philip Brozel, and Lemprière Pringle, and the solo instrumentalists comprise Messrs. Maurice Sons, Brodsky, and Petschnikoff (violinists), Miss Fanny Davies and Mr. Franz Rummel (pianists). The orchestra will number eighty performers, Mr. Sons returns as principal first violin, and Mr. Willem Kes will again be the conductor. The following works will be performed:—Overtures: Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3," Cherubini's "Medea," Dvorák's "Carnival," and Berlioz's "King Lear"; Symphonies: Volkmann's in D minor, Beethoven's B flat, No. 4, and "Pastoral," Haydn's No. 9 of the Salomon series, and Cowen's "Scandinavian"; Concertos (violin): Wieniawski's No. 2 and Mendelssohn's ever welcome composition. The pianoforte concertos include Chopin's No. 2 in F minor and Saint-Saëns's work in G minor. The season opens on the evening of the 30th inst., when Berlioz's "Faust" will be given in conjunction, of course, with the Glasgow Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Joseph Bradley.

On the afternoon of the 2nd ult. the Glasgow Choral Union gave a service of sacred music in the Nave of the Cathedral, when Spohr's "The Last Judgment" and selections from "Judas Maccabæus" were given with excellent effect. The new Cathedral organist, Mr. Herbert Walton, presided at the organ, and the soloists were Miss Amelia Holding (soprano), Mr. J. G. Wood (tenor), and Mr. Atherton Smith (bass), who made an excellent impression.

Messrs. Paterson, Sons and Co. have already announced concerts by Messrs. Halstead and Kosman (chamber music), Eugene d'Albert, Willy Hess, with his famous Cologne Quartet, and Albert Rieu.

The Glasgow Society of Musicians inaugurated its new club premises, on the 14th ult., with a very successful smoking concert. An interesting programme was sustained by Messrs. P. E. Halstead, Daly, Sons, Bender, and Schweizer (instrumentalists), and the vocal music was undertaken by Messrs. H. A. L. Seligmann, Sharpe, and Summers. Mr. Julius Seligmann, the genial and veteran president of the Society, occupied the chair.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

The first concert of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 12th ult., when Sir Frederick Bridge's "Flag of England" was given as a recognition of the Victorian Jubilee. The performance was an excellent one and the work was very favourably received. The symphony was Beethoven's well-known "Eroica," and all the other numbers of the programme were familiar. A Mozart symphony followed at the next concert, on the 26th ult., and the chorus is announced a little later to participate in Elgar's "King Olaf." It is understood that the Musical Society will give Mascagni's "Rustic Chivalry," but to utilise a band and chorus advertised as four hundred strong upon such material seems something like a waste of power. The Liscard Society appears to have gone the way of all flesh of the choral genus hereabouts, if such a simile may be permitted, and at Runcorn a new way has been found to presumably pay old debts. The two societies previously existent in this town having been hampered with adverse balances, it was decided to amalgamate both as regards membership and finance, and an able conductor has been found for the joint organisations in Mr. Granville Bantock. At Warrington Mr. F. H. Crossley is preparing "Elijah" and "The Messiah," and at Newton-le-Willows the same conductor has Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day" in hand. At Chester Sir Frederick Bridge's "Flag of England" is being rehearsed, under the baton of his brother, by the local musical society.

Among local events of what may be termed the popular order there remain to be recorded the first of the Winter Entertainments, given on the 21st ult., and the ballad concerts of Mr. Thomas Shaw and Mr. Percy White. The most important gathering of the past month, so far as concerns a smaller class of performance, was that of the 9th ult., when Messrs. Leonard Borwick and Plunket Greene gave a delightful pianoforte and song recital.

The first ladies' concert of the Orchestral Society took place on the 16th ult. Mr. Rodewald has the courage of his convictions and presented nothing less than Brahms's second Symphony (No. 2) in D. But the result, as evidenced by the attention with which this fine work was received, proved that the conductor's confidence in their appreciation had not been misplaced.

The Sunday concerts are again in full swing, under the direction of Mr. W. I. Argent, and both St. George's large and small halls ("small" only by comparison, for it accommodates 1,200) have been crowded on each occasion since the 10th ult., when the first performance was given.

The annual meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held on the 9th ult., and Mr. Schneider was elected secretary of the Liverpool section, vice Mr. W. D. Hall resigned. A banquet was announced, under the auspices of this Society, for the 23rd ult., the guests being Dr. A. L. Peace and Mr. F. H. Cowen, two important newcomers to the ranks of what may be termed the local residential professorate.

The Goossens Male-voice Choir was founded in Liverpool in 1894, by the late conductor of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, and has only from time to time given public evidences of its existence. The last such occasion was on the 19th ult., when, at a concert given in the Picton Hall, two choruses, "The survivors of Tydal," by Heger, and the "Hymn of life," by Riga, were given. Compositions of the order to which these belong are generally unfamiliar to English concert-goers, and they proved extremely interesting, both in regard to their inherent dramatic attributes and that faultlessness of performance which can result only from prolonged study. Mr. Goossens conducted and may be congratulated upon the success attendant upon his work.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

After several months of a quietness, which was becoming wearisome, there is every probability that the coming winter may be cheered and enlivened by much delightful music. After some amateur preluding and the excellent vocal recital at which Mrs. Montagu Fordham had the assistance of Mr. Ernest Sharp, and, at the pianoforte, the skilful aid of Madame Fromm, Dr. Watson, on the 13th ult., professionally opened the season with a miscellaneous performance in which the old merits of the Vocal Society were well maintained. On the following evening Mr. Bispham gave a delightful selection from the songs of Schubert and Schumann with a versatility which no singer now on the concert platform could surpass; having so able a coadjutor as Signor Risegari, who is far too seldom induced to favour the public by his refined violin playing.

Manchester has, during the last forty years, been greatly favoured with respect to orchestral music, and each recent season has shown an increasing interest in it, a ripening judgment of its intrinsic merits, and a greater insight into the efficiency of its interpretation. Naturally, there came a time when confidence in the stability of our local resources, and in the excellence of that organisation which rendered this city so important and so active a centre, brought about a degree of self-satisfaction which endangered progress, and when we needed the occasional stimulus of a visit by Dr. Richter, M. Lamoureux, and other touring conductors. But we shall ever be grateful to Sir Charles Hallé and to that keen business capacity which enabled him, without external aid, to establish upon a firm basis a perfectly unique undertaking; for freeing music from the enervating domination of fashion and social influence, and for boldly throwing open the doors of our concert-rooms to those who love music for its own sake, independently of all accessories and enfeebling surroundings. And the feeling which leads us fully to admit this indebtedness to our old chief, demands also a fair acknowledgment of the service now being rendered by the successor upon whose shoulders his mantle has so happily fallen—a successor in whose veins the warm current of enthusiasm has not yet cooled.

Listening to the performances of Wednesday and Thursday evenings, the 20th and 21st ult., in the Free Trade Hall, it was impossible to avoid making comparisons which may be very helpful, and need not be in the slightest degree odious. Dr. Richter has never had here an audience nearly so large as that drawn by a programme very agreeably departing from that somewhat rigid adherence to a set pattern which, certainly, ought never again to be allowed to detract from the usefulness of his annual visits. How the "Leonora" Overture, the "Carneval" Overture of Dvorák, and the inevitable Liszt "Rhapsody" which invariably serves as a show piece for the orchestral soloists (like the "selection" of inferior programmes) were played by so accomplished a corps, under the control of so experienced a conductor, and after so many public and private rehearsals, need not here be recorded. One added excellence, certainly, was the greater subordination of what a thoughtless critic once termed the "splendour of the brass"—a splendour of which we should not object to a yet further mitigation. The "Siegfried" Idyll was welcome, if not as an "entrancingly beautiful poem"—as the annotator pronounced it—yet as a wholly admirable example of the immense power of elaboration of texts and of that thoroughly exhaustive workmanship which enabled Wagner to make the most of his thematic material. The warmest admirers of Brahms do not contend that his Fourth Symphony (around which romantic recollections cling) is a work concerning which there is no room for varieties of estimate; but there will be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of its selection as the chief work performed during the Richter tour of the autumn of 1897, and as to the adequacy of its rendering.

Mr. Cowen was very warmly welcomed when he appeared on the platform to commence the work of the fortieth season of the Thursday evening concerts, upon the success of which so much depends. As to the immense improvement which since his appointment he has effected, there could be no question whatever. The discipline of the band is far stricter, the colouring of the interpretation of the music is greatly heightened, and evidently he possesses the sympathy and confidence of all who play under him. There are other evidences of the firmness with which he demands respect for music and for quietness during its performance. The programme of the opening concert showed a confidence in the capabilities of the orchestra which was fully justified. Familiarity with the most finished readings of the C minor Symphony renders a Manchester audience watchful of its interpretation and quite able to criticise any shortcomings: but there were none in Beethoven, while the variations of Tschaïkowsky—so full of Russian extravagances—and the "Jubilee" Overture of Weber (with which the concert appropriately commenced) received almost more care than they deserved. Miss Clara Butt was the vocalist, and displayed her magnificent voice as she was wont to do; but her selection of songs was scarcely worthy of the occasion. Madame Irma Sethe's rendering of the Violin Concerto in B minor of Saint-Saëns was admirable in tone, execution, and taste. She completely confirmed the good impression which she made last season.

Due notice must be deferred of the first recital of chamber music of the series to be given during the winter under the direction of Mr. Carl Fuchs, and of the commencement of Mr. Brodsky's season at the Gentlemen's Concert Hall.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

A most interesting concert, under the auspices of the Newcastle Chamber Music Society, was given in Olympia, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 19th ult., by Dr. Richter and his orchestra of ninety performers. The programme consisted largely of excerpts from the works of Wagner, which appeared to be very greatly appreciated. It also included Tschaïkowsky's Symphonie Pathétique, a very fine performance of which was given.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" obtained a very satisfactory hearing at St. George's Church, Jesmond, on the 15th ult. A small but efficient orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. J. H. Beers, was engaged for the occasion; Mr. J. G. Robson presided at the organ, and Mr. J. M. Preston, the organist of the church, conducted. Sir A. C. Mackenzie's Benedictus, an Andante by Grieg, and the March from Mendelssohn's "Athalie" were also played.

The Newcastle People's Concerts commenced on Saturday, the 16th ult., the artists engaged for the occasion being Miss Emily Davies, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. David Hughes, Mr. John Dunn (violin), and Miss Kate Liddle (pianoforte).

A new Society has just been formed in Gateshead, under the title of the "Gateshead Vocal Society." The first work to be placed in rehearsal is Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," a performance of which will be given during the season. The conductor is Mr. Newton Laycock.

The Wooler Choral Society, of which Mr. C. Stanley Wise is the conductor, has resumed work for the season with Handel's "Judas Maccabæus."

The Harrison Concerts were announced to commence in Olympia, Newcastle, on the 28th ult. The artists for the first concert were Madame Melba, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Douglas Powell, Miss Llewela Davies, M. Gorski, Mr. Frederic Griffith, and Mr. Landon Ronald.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

"Elijah" was performed in St. Mary's Church, Sheffield, on the 11th ult. The chorus numbered 120 voices and the performance was in every way a success. The popularity of the innovation was proved by the crowded state of the large church, nearly 2,500 people being present. Mr. J. A. Rodgers, the organist and choirmaster, conducted.

Mr. A. S. Burrows has been appointed conductor of the St. Matthias Choral Society. Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm is in rehearsal.

Mr. A. R. Gaul's cantata "Ruth" was performed at Heeley, on the 17th ult., under Mr. W. Chapman.

On the 26th ult. a new organisation, the Sheffield Male Glee and Madrigal Society, gave its initial concert, under Mr. J. A. Rodgers, in the Music Hall, Surrey Street. The programme included Cooke's "Hohenlinden," Wilbye's "Come, shepherd swains," and eight other choral pieces.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

Concerts in Bournemouth are fairly numerous, although up to the present they have been largely of the miscellaneous order. Conspicuous exceptions have been the Symphony Concerts at the Winter Gardens, which commenced for the season on the 7th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Dan Godfrey, Jun. The municipal band has been strengthened by the addition of extra violoncellos and basses, and is now probably one of the best permanent orchestras to be heard out of London. Mr. Godfrey's scheme for his third series of sixty Symphony concerts provides for the performance of the whole of the symphonies of Beethoven, Dvorák, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Gade, Sterndale Bennett, Goetz, and Goldmark; most of those by Brahms, Raff, Rubinstein, Spohr, Schubert, and Tschaïkowsky, and, of course, some by Haydn and Mozart. Many novelties will also be given, including Saint-Saëns's first Symphony and a Suite by Widor, both of which will be played for the first time in England at these concerts.

Mr. Frangcon-Davies appeared here on the 9th ult., supported by Miss Louise Nanney, Miss Kate Ould, and Mr. Stanley Hawley. The eminent baritone's "cantilations," to Mr. Stanley Hawley's accompaniments (which, it will be remembered, were first introduced here by Mr. Charles Fry) were much enjoyed.

Miss Aylward's chamber concert at the Assembly Rooms, on September 28, was very successful. An important number of the programme was Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, played by the concert-giver, Mr. Percy Frostick, and Mr. W. E. Whitehouse. Madame Belle Cole was the vocalist.

The Southampton Philharmonic Society has arranged for three concerts during the season. Rehearsals of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" have already commenced. "The Messiah" and "Judas Maccabæus" will follow. Mr. H. M. Pike is the conductor of this flourishing Society.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

From April to September there is little or no serious music heard in Yorkshire. Probably few towns of the size of Leeds are so destitute of good music for six months in the year as is that great and busy town—or city, as it now delights in being styled. With all its size, wealth, and honours, however; with all its reputation as a musical centre, it seems unable or unwilling to support a local orchestra. The attempt made a year ago to establish one has been attended with such financial disaster that it seems at least doubtful whether it can be continued this season. It certainly deserved a better fate, for Mr. Benton's band gave us some good music and played it most creditably. At Bradford, on the other hand, the permanent orchestra has passed through its period of struggling, and is doing well—in a pecuniary as well as an artistic sense. On the 16th ult. its season opened with a concert at which the Scène d'Amour from the "Roméo et Juliette" Symphony of Berlioz and a portion of Dvorák's "New World" Symphony were heard, the latter being most creditably played, under Mr. Bartle's direction. Mr. Philip Cathie was the violinist and played Mendelssohn's Concerto, Miss Palliser contributing a couple of Gounod's songs, in addition to sundry ballads. On the following Monday evening the first of the series of ballad concerts given in Bradford by the Messrs. Harrison, of Birmingham, served to introduce Madame Melba and her concert party.

In point of actual date, one of the earliest concerts of the season in the West Riding was one given at Leeds on September 27, when Madame Patti appeared and roused her admirers to a pitch of frenzy by her singing of "Home, sweet home," "Comin' thro' the rye," and "The last rose of summer." Associated with Madame Patti were some artists of more than average merit in Madame Gomez, Messrs. Robertson and Fergusson—the latter a young baritone with considerable dramatic power, by the way—Miss Muriel Elliot (pianoforte) and Mr. Henley (violin). On the 18th ult. the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company began its fortnight's season in Leeds. Its programme for the first week was certainly liable to the charge brought against it by correspondents to the local press of staleness, the only unhackneyed opera put forward being Puccini's "La Bohème." But it is obvious the company can hardly be expected to do equal justice to two simultaneous seasons in London and the provinces, and it is certainly open to question whether it can thus divide its forces without a loss of power. The only remaining Leeds concert falling to be noticed is one given on the 19th ult., in aid of a charity, to which vocalists no less eminent than Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Andrew Black gave their services.

Huddersfield is, in point of time, always well to the fore in matters musical. This is chiefly because it rejoices in a series of subscription concerts so long that it extends over six months. Variety is the Huddersfield watchword, and accordingly the first of the concerts, on September 28, took the form of one of Mr. Grossmith's amusing entertainments, the only possible objection to it being that one wondered what it had to do with a series of subscription concerts. The second concert, on the 12th ult., restored the balance, a creditable performance of the Beethoven Septet being its main feature. Mr. Clinton's clarinet playing in this, and in Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, deserves especial commendation for its quiet artistic refinement. Mr. Gerald Walenn was the violinist and Miss Adela Verne the pianist, Madame Bertha Moore and Mr. Charles Copland contributing songs. On the 15th ult. the Huddersfield Choral Society gave its first concert of the season. Enterprise is not its foible, so that the "Golden Legend" and "The Revenge" were, for them, in the light of interesting novelties. Mr. J. Bowling conducted, the principals were Miss Ella Russell, Miss Rosa Green, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and the concert seems to have been generally successful. On the 5th ult. the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society gave one of its unpretending but enjoyable concerts, Mr. Joshua Marshall taking the place of the regular conductor, Mr. Ibeson, in consequence of the latter's ill-health.

At present the delights of the musical season are chiefly in anticipation, and it may be of interest to enumerate the principal choral works announced for performance by Yorkshire societies. Probably no society has more on its hands than the Bradford Festival Choral Society, which is not only content with undertaking five important works, but has managed to include among them some novelties of exceptional interest. In conjunction with the very successful subscription concerts of the town there is to be given Berlioz's "Troyens," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and Goring Thomas's beautiful posthumous cantata "The Swan and the Skylark." On its own account the Society intends giving Mr. Elgar's fine work "King Olaf"—the performance of which, under Mr. Cowen's conductorship, will be of exceptional interest—as well as the "Redemption." No doubt it is Mr. Cowen's influence which we may thank for so go-ahead a programme; and now that the Leeds Philharmonic Society has made Dr. Stanford its conductor, we may reasonably look forward to an advance in its programmes. For the present, however, it is content with Haydn's "Creation," Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht," "The Messiah," Brahms's "German Requiem," and Dr. Parry's "St. Cecilia's Day," a choice which, if not sensational, is unexceptionable. The other Leeds Society, the Choral Union, begins its season with Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," followed, at a second concert, by Schubert's Mass in E flat and a "Tannhäuser" selection.

A welcome revival is promised by the Bradford Old Choral Society, which is to give Sir A. C. Mackenzie's too much neglected oratorio "The Rose of Sharon." The Halifax Society will give Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty" and Dr. Parry's "King Saul," both under the conductorship of their respective composers. Another enterprising Society, that of Dewsbury, intends to repeat Dr. Parry's "Judith," which it gave very successfully a year or two ago; Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Dr. Stanford's capital choral ballad "Phaudrig Crohoore" being also in its prospectus. At Hull, the Harmonic Society has succeeded in persuading Dr. Parry to visit them and conduct his oratorio "Job," its other two concerts being given up to "The Messiah" and "Elijah." The Vocal Society in the same town has chosen Dvorák's "Stabat Mater"—the continued popularity of which is a satisfactory sign—and Sullivan's "Golden Legend." The latter popular work is also to be given by the York Musical Society, together with "Elijah." The enterprising Musical Union at Middlesbrough has, as usual, an interesting programme. Besides several orchestral pieces of importance, Mr. Elgar's "King Olaf" will be heard, under the composer's conductorship; Bach's Christmas Oratorio (Parts I. and II.), Dr. Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," and Professor Bridge's "Inchcape Rock" being the remaining choral works promised. The Huddersfield Choral Society will of course give "The Messiah" at Christmas, and, in addition to this, which may be styled its specialty, it intends to revive Professor Prout's "Hereward." The Keighley Musical Union offers a charming medley in "Elijah," Goring Thomas's "The Swan and the Skylark," and, of all things in the world, "Maritana." This surely smacks of compromise. Nearly as strange is the Batley Choral Society's choice of the "Lily of Killarney" coupled with the "Creation." At Ripon, English composers are to have an exclusive hearing, Cowen's "St. John's Eve" and Prout's "Hereward" being the two works selected; while at Beverley, Stanford's "The Revenge" is to be given, together with the "Creation," the exceptional attention to which is no doubt accounted for by the fact that it this year celebrates its centenary. At Morley, Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" with "Loreley" and "The Messiah" form the programme, while most of the other Societies whose plans for the season have come under our notice are content with a more or less stereotyped choice of works.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

Mdlle Ackté, who, as will be remembered, gained the first prize for operatic singing at this year's concours at the Conservatoire, made a most brilliant début at the Opéra, on the 8th ult., in "Faust," displaying qualities which will entitle her ere long to a place in the foremost rank of her profession. Two days before, on the 6th ult., Mdlle. Grandjean re-appeared in the part of Brünnhilde, in M. Reyer's "Sigurd," with much success, Mdlle. Darcey making her début on the same occasion and acquitting herself very creditably, though obviously suffering from nervousness. M. Massenet's "Thaïs" is about to be revived here, and the composer has written some additional numbers for the occasion. These are, a tableau, "l'Oasis," and a divertissement in the third act, in which one of the ladies of the ballet, who possesses a good voice, is introduced at once dancing and singing. The first performance of "Die Meistersinger" has been postponed until the early part of this month in order to ensure as perfect a performance as possible.

At the Opéra Comique, M. David, a tenor who made his mark some time since in "Les Troyens," reappeared in "Lakmé," and Mdlle. Simonet in the part of Manon, with great success. On the 18th ult. the first performance took place of "Le Spahi," poème lyrique in four acts, the libretto (founded upon M. Pierre Loti's novel) by MM. Louis Gallet and André Alexandre, set to music by M. Lucien Lambert. This is the work which obtained the Ville de Paris prize, carrying with it a subvention of 30,000 francs, to be paid to the theatrical manager who undertakes to mount such work; a circumstance of which M. Carvalho has thus availed himself. "Le Spahi" may be described as a series of tableaux rather than a really dramatic work. The composer has treated the picturesque aspects of his subject with happy effect, and, taken as a whole, his score, which holds a middle course between the old school and the advanced, is very ably written. Mdlle. Guiraudon, in the part of Fatou-gaye, scored a distinct success, more particularly in the final tableau, which is also the best. M. Badiali hardly did adequate justice to the part of Jean, while MM. Carbonne and Gresse were most efficient in their respective parts. M. Luigini conducted. The work has been well mounted, M. Jambon being responsible for the very pretty scenery. For the month of February next M. Carvalho has engaged an artist well known in England and n the United States, Mdlle. Zélie de Lussan.

The question of the continuance of the Lamoureux Concerts has at length been satisfactorily settled, the members of the orchestra having unanimously accepted M. Chevillard, M. Lamoureux's son-in-law, as their future conductor.

An important addition is to be made to M. Colonne's undertaking, as he intends, in addition to his usual grand Sunday concerts, to give matinée performances once a week devoted more especially to works which do not demand a full orchestral complement and appertaining to different epochs, styles, and nationalities. These concerts will be given on Thursdays, to commence with the 4th inst. The Sunday concerts were resumed on the 17th ult., with M. Raoul Pugno as the pianist.

At the small Théâtre Lyrique, at the Galerie Vivienne, an interesting revival of Bellini's "Norma" took place on the 4th ult., that work not having been sung in Paris, in the French language, for thirty years. Mesdames Claus and De Néva, and the tenor, M. Flachat, were in the principal parts. The work is now alternating here with Halévy's "La Fée aux Roses."

M. Harold Bauer, the excellent pianist, is about to give a series of recitals at Brussels and Amsterdam, and is engaged for one of the Philharmonic Society's concerts in Vienna, under Dr. Hans Richter, next month, where he will appear for the first time. M. Henri Falcke is making a concert tour in Norway and Germany. Madame Roger-Miclos, on her part, has entered into an engagement with the impresario Schürmann for a series of twenty-five concerts in Holland during the present month.

M. Lyon, the inventor of the "harpe chromatique," not content with having transformed that instrument, has succeeded in rendering a similar service to the timbale or kettle-drum; so composers will now have to reckon also with the "timbales chromatiques."

On dit, that Mdlle. Sybil Sanderson is about to be married to M. Antonio Terry, a Cuban planter.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

The Oratorio Society, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch, announces a programme of more than usual interest. For the first time for several seasons Mr. Damrosch will indulge his patrons with an absolute novelty, "St. Christopher," by Professor Horatio W. Parker, which is to be published shortly by Novello, Ewer and Co.; and two quasi-novelties, Gounod's "Redemption" and Dr. Leopold Damrosch's "The Sulamite," the latter designed to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Society by Dr. Damrosch. Professor Parker's work is awaited with immense interest, and increased support of the Oratorio Society is assured by this, its first recognition of native talent and industry. It is to be hoped that the distinction of producing for the first time an important work by an important man will rouse the best efforts of all concerned in the performance.

America, and more especially Philadelphia, has lost, in the person of Mr. Michael Cross, who died on September 26, one of the most able, useful, and lovable of her sons. Born in 1830, of musicianly parents, he was ripe for an organist's position at the age of fifteen. For fifty-two years he toiled, in his native city and its vicinity exclusively, in the cause of musical art. During his career he occupied several church positions, two of them, SS. Peter and Paul and Holy Trinity, for eighteen and seventeen years respectively. Mr. Cross was for twenty-five years director of the Orpheus Society and at different times director also of the Cæcilian, the Handel and Haydn, the Abt, and the Eurydice. Some of Mr. Cross's triumphs were his productions of Gounod's "Redemption" and "Mors et Vita" and Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion. Mr. Cross will be sadly missed.

Mr. William Smedley has left his post as choirmaster in All Angels' Church, New York, after undergoing an operation for cataract, which appears to have been only partially successful. He was formerly for many years choirmaster in St. James's Church, Chicago, where he won great distinction as a trainer of boys' voices. His last service at All Angels' was on the evening of the Feast of St. Michael and All Angels, at which the anthems were "Who is like unto Thee" (Sullivan) and "My hope is in the Everlasting" (Stainer). Mr. Smedley sailed for England, his native land, on the 9th ult., bearing with him the good wishes of his many friends.

Mr. Helfenstein has undertaken the training of the choir of All Angels' Church, in place of Mr. William Smedley, but he still retains his position as organist and choirmaster of Grace Church.

Mr. Thomas Whitney Surette, the author of a forthcoming cantata entitled "St. Agnes' Eve," is to deliver a course of lectures upon Church music in New York and Philadelphia this season. Mr. Surette is thoroughly versed in Church music, with high ideas and a fine critical sense.

The Worcester (Mass.) festival has come and gone, leaving an excellent record behind. The veteran conductor, Carl Zerrahn, plucked more laurels, as did also Professor Horatio W. Parker by his direction of his own splendid work "Hora Novissima," and Mr. David Bispham, who came especially from England solely for this festival.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel have come amongst us again, to the great satisfaction of the numberless admirers of their perfect art. Mr. Henschel proposes to take a limited number of pupils during his sojourn here.

There will be no lack of orchestral concerts this season. The venerable Philharmonic will give eight instead of six, each "concert" being preceded as of yore by a "rehearsal" on the afternoon of the previous day; the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted successively by Nikisch, Geicke, Henschel, and, at present, Paur, will give five concerts; Mr. Walter Damrosch's Symphony Orchestra will contribute its usual quota; Mr. Seidl will give concerts in Chickering Hall, and other series of concerts will be given by an orchestra of ninety performers, under his direction, at the new Astoria Hotel, which will be opened on the 1st inst.

The Brooklyn Oratorio Society will perform Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at its first concert, under Mr. W. H. Hall. This will be the first rendering of this oratorio in Brooklyn.

It is stated, upon good authority, that we are early next year to be favoured with a visit from Sir Walter Parratt. Sir Walter, if he comes—a consummation devoutly to be wished—will meet with a most hearty welcome from all lovers of organ playing and organ music.

The consecration of the new permanent Church of St. Gabriel, Willesden Green, took place on Thursday, the 7th ult., the Bishop of London officiating, assisted by the Bishop of Marlborough. The priest in charge (Rev. G. M. Clibborn), churchwardens, and choir of the church, followed by a large number of local clergy, the two Bishops and their official attendants proceeded from the temporary church to the new building, the choir singing appropriate Psalms to Gregorian chants. The celebration was fully choral—the Kyrie, Creed, and Gloria being from Henry Smart's Service in F, the Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei, Paternoster, &c., from Merbecke. At evensong, Stainer's Parisian Tones and Horsley's anthem "I was glad" were sung. At the close of the service a solemn Te Deum was sung to the setting of Smart in F. The services, which were highly impressive, were accompanied on the new and very effective Walker organ by the recently appointed organist and choirmaster, Mr. Frederick N. Belchamber, who will give short organ recitals frequently. The programmes on the 7th and 10th ult. included Concerto in B flat (Handel), Grand Chœur and Cantilène Pastorale (Guilmant), Festive March in D and Andante in A (Smart), &c. During Advent Spohr's "Last Judgment" and other appropriate works will be sung by the choir of the church. There is, therefore, indication that with a liberal-minded vicar and an able organist and choir-director this church will increase the reputation for its musical services in this locality which it had already gained in its temporary quarters.

Sir Walter Parratt, owing to the pressure of other engagements, has been obliged to resign the honorary conductorship of the Windsor and Eton Amateur Orchestral Society, which he has held since its formation, fourteen years ago; and also that of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society, the duties of which he has most ably discharged for the last seven years. Much regret has naturally been expressed at Sir Walter's decision, as both Societies have greatly flourished under his magnetic influence and skilled musicianship. Dr. Harford Lloyd, Precentor of Eton, has been elected honorary conductor of the Orchestral Society, of which the Princess Christian is the patron, and Sir Walter Parratt has been unanimously chosen the first president. Dr. Lloyd, whose "Jubilee Thanksgiving Ode" is now in rehearsal, has consented to discharge the duties of conductor of the Choral Society for the present.

Miss Clara Butt met with a most gratifying reception, both on the part of her audience and in the organs of the press, on the occasion of a recital given by her on the 4th ult., at the Berlin Singakademie. Herr Otto Lessmann, in paying a warm tribute to the young artist's talents, in the columns of the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, says: "Miss Butt is gifted with a genuine contralto voice, full and mellow to a wonderful degree, and her interpretation of a number of English, French, and German songs was distinguished by so much gracefulness and natural taste that one could not find leisure for a critical analysis of the admirable effect produced; whether it was the result of a most excellent method or the manifestation of a heavenly gift pure and simple. The lady, moreover, managed the three languages in which she sang with surprising distinctness and purity of enunciation."

In connection with the series of evening lectures and entertainments which has been arranged during the winter months at the Bishopsgate Institute, a most successful concert was given, on the 8th ult., under the direction of Mr. Vivian Collett. The vocalists were Miss Ethel Sedley, Miss Randell, Mr. A. C. Legh, and Mr. H. H. Collett. Miss Winifred Brabant and Mr. Lidgey respectively contributed some violin and pianoforte solos, and Mr. Vivian Collett was the accompanist. Mrs. T. C. Collett recited Anstey's "Positively the last performance" and "The newsboy's debt," by an anonymous author, with great ability.

Harvest thanksgiving services were held at St. Philip's Church, Queen's Road, Battersea, on the 10th ult., when the music performed included Mozart's Seventh Mass, Sir George Martin's 150th Psalm, Smart in B flat, "Praise the Lord," Goss, and "While the earth remaineth," Tours. An excellent rendering was also given of Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion." The soloist in the cantata was Mr. Frederick Ward. Mr. Frank Heavens, organist and choirmaster of St. George's Chapel, South Audley Street, accompanied, and Mr. B. Heaviside, organist and choirmaster of the church, was the conductor.

At the recent examination for degrees in music at Durham University, the following gentlemen satisfied the examiners: Doctor in Music: Albion Percy Alderson, Herbert Botting, Hamilton Robinson, and Frederick George Shinn. Bachelor in Music: Frederick W. Bussey, Arthur Docksey, Percy Godfrey, Arthur Hey, Alfred Livingstone Hirst, Ernest Lindop, Arthur Lyne, William A. Montgomery, George H. Moreton, William Rigby, Thomas Webb, and Henry W. Weston. The examiners were Professor Philip Armes, Sir Frederick Bridge, and Dr. Joseph C. Bridge.

A very successful concert was given in the Lecture Hall of Upper Holloway Chapel, on the 12th ult., by the organist, Mr. H. B. Carter. The programme included trios by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, played by Messrs. W. and P. Bidgood and the concert-giver; also songs by Miss Amy Carter and Messrs. J. Doubleday and Robert J. Harris. The harp solos of Miss Annie Hughes, Erard Harp Scholar at the Royal Academy of Music, were a very enjoyable feature of the evening.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society announces that the following works will be performed at the four concerts to be given during the coming season, the twentieth of the Society: Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride"; new scena, "Daybreak," by Clarisse Mallard; "Ode to a Nightingale," R. H. Walthew; Weber's "Preciosa" and Somervell's cantata "Power of Sound"; "The Messiah," and Berlioz's "Faust." Mr. G. H. Betjemann will again occupy his usual post as conductor.

Mr. Alfred Blume, who, after holding a vocal professorship for a number of years at the Royal College of Music, accepted the post of vocal instructor of the Royal Theatre, Wiesbaden, last year, has lately taken up his residence in Berlin, where he is establishing a vocal academy. Earlier in the present year Mr. Blume stayed some time at Bayreuth, at the request of Miss Brema, his former pupil, to enable her to study the parts of Fricka and Kundry with him.

A three days' "International Amateur Brass and Reed Bands Grand Contest" will take place at Nice on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd inst., when £4,000 sterling (100,000 francs) will be awarded in cash prizes to duly classed victorious bands. Several classes, having prizes graduated from first prizes of £400 downwards, are open to foreign and British amateur bands. Mr. Enderby Jackson, Sherwood House, Scarborough, is the representative for Great Britain.

An excellent photograph of the monument over the grave of Sir Joseph Barnby, in Norwood Cemetery, has been published by the Art Memorial Company, West Norwood. The following is the inscription on the base of the cross: "Sir Joseph Barnby, died 28th Jan., 1896. This cross is erected in affectionate remembrance by the members of the Royal Choral Society, of which he was for twenty-four years the conductor."

Mr. Haydn Grover, of the Temple Church Choir, gave a chamber concert at Norwood Central Schools, on September 27. The artists included Miss E. Dell, Miss Lewthwaite, Miss Stokoe (violin), Miss Baker, Mr. Herbert Grover, the Crichton Part-Singers, and Mr. Arthur Grover. Mrs. Frederick King presided at the pianoforte.

The Harvest festival was held at St. Michael's, Star Street, Paddington, on the 20th ult., when the greater part of Mr. Edmund Rogers's cantata "A Song of Praise" was sung by the choir of the church, under the direction of the composer.

Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, a pupil of Dr. Joachim, has obtained the Berlin Mendelssohn Scholarship, of the value of 1,500 marks, from amongst twenty-two competitors for the much-coveted distinction.

Organ recitals will be given in Holy Trinity Church, Sloane Street, by Mr. W. Alcock (the organist of the church), on Saturdays in November, at 4 o'clock.

Messrs. Ellis and Elvey, of 29, New Bond Street, have recently purchased the important collection of rare books upon the theory and practice of music formed by the late John Bishop of Cheltenham, and will shortly issue a priced catalogue.

Mr. Granville Bantock, the able musical director at the Tower, New Brighton, has been appointed conductor of the Runcorn Philharmonic Society, the first concert of which is announced to take place on the 17th inst.

An organ recital was given by Dr. Charles W. Pearce, at Islington Presbyterian Church, on September 29. Miss Hilda Alexander and Miss Lorimer gave respectively some acceptable vocal and violin selections.

The inaugural address for the session of 1897-98 of Trinity College London was delivered, on the 5th ult., by the Warden, Professor Dr. E. H. Turpin. The subject was "Art Work and Art Workers."

Her Royal Highness the Princess Christian has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of Mr. Franklin Taylor's book on "Technique and Expression in Pianoforte Playing."

The Local Exhibition in singing (value nine guineas) offered annually by Trinity College London has been awarded to Miss Katherine Andersen, a pupil of Miss Clarice Ryall-Davis, of Bristol.

The Dean and Chapter of York announce that they are about to fill up the appointment of organist, in succession to the late Dr. Naylor. Applications are to be sent to the Chapter Clerk, York.

Mr. W. H. Cummings, Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, has accepted the post of President of the North London Male-voice Choir, of which Mr. Munro Davison is conductor.

Sir Walter Parratt, according to the information given in our American correspondent's letter, is reported to be about to visit the United States during the course of next year.

Dr. A. Madeley Richardson, organist and director of the choir of St. Saviour's Collegiate Church, has accepted the additional appointment of director of the music at Guy's Hospital.

Signor Mancinelli's "Ero e Leandro," produced at last year's Norwich Festival, will be performed at Madrid this month, at Turin about Christmas, and at Venice in January.

The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna, an institution of world-wide celebrity, announces a performance of Dvorák's "St. Ludmila" for the 14th inst.

Her Majesty the Queen has conferred the Jubilee commemoration medal upon Mr. Ralph Dadge, organist of Crathie Parish Church.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Baden-Baden.—The valuable library of the late Richard Pohl, the well-known musical author, has been purchased from his widow by the municipal authorities here and will ere long be accessible to students. The collection includes a number of interesting autographs.

Berlin.—A most successful performance of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy was given from September 27 to 30, at the Royal Opera, under Herr Weingartner's direction, and with Mesdames Lilli Lehmann, Rosa Sucher, and Goetze, Herren Vogl, Friedrichs, Burgstaller, and Van Rooy in leading parts. Amongst new works to be brought out here during the next two or three months may be instanced Spinelli's "A basso Porto," Bungert's "Odysseus Heimkehr," and a "Don Quixote," by Herr Wilhelm Kienzl. Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," in Richard Wagner's version, is likewise in course of preparation. An opera, "Alár," by Count Geza Zichy, is to be mounted, by special desire of the Emperor, in the new year.—Herr Franz Betz, the famous baritone of the Opera, the original interpreter of Hans Sachs at the memorable first performance of "Die Meistersinger," in Munich, has just retired on his well earned pension, after nearly thirty-seven years' service. He will, however, still appear here occasionally in some of his principal parts.——A young Hungarian pianist, Herr Ernst von Dohnanyi, gave his first recital here on the 1st ult., and, in pieces by Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, and Liszt, attracted much notice by his advanced technique and artistic intelligence.——A "cycle" of Offenbach's operettas, from "La Perichole" to the "Contes d'Hoffmann," now running its successful course at the Theatre Unter den Linden, merits a record. The fin de siècle revival of Offenbach, both here and elsewhere, is not without a certain artistic significance.

Bonn.—There appears to be some probability of Herr August Bungert's ambitious scheme—viz., the performance of his gigantic work "Homeric World," in a theatre specially erected for the purpose—being realised. It will be remembered that the music-drama "Odysseus Heimkehr," forming part of a tetralogy, was brought out with considerable success last season at Dresden, and the work is now also in preparation at Berlin and Hamburg. The projected theatre for the performance of the entire work is to be situate at Godesberg, on the Rhine, and it is said that the greater part of the necessary capital has already been subscribed for—on the basis of "Patronats Scheine" of the value of 500 marks each, similar to those issued in connection with the Bayreuth Festspielhaus.

Brussels.—At the Concert Populaire of the 10th ult., in which M. Saint-Saëns took part in his capacity of organ virtuoso and conductor, the programme consisted chiefly of works by the eminent French composer, including the first performance here of the cantata "La Lyre et la Harpe," and of the Symphony in C minor for orchestra, organ, and pianoforte. The concert of the 21st ult. will be conducted by Herr Richard Strauss, of Munich, when the symphonic poems "Don Juan" and "Zarathustra" and the "Eulenspiegel" extravaganza are to obtain a first hearing at this institution. Madame Strauss (née de Ahna) will be the vocalist.——The grand prix de Rome for musical composition has just been awarded to M. Joseph Jongen, a pupil at the Conservatoire of M. Radoux, for his cantata "Comala," which is said to be a work of altogether exceptional merit. M. Jongen, who is in his twenty-fourth year, and a native of Liège, has obtained all the official distinctions possible of attainment at the Conservatoire. The people of Liège are naturally very proud of him and on his return last month to his native place gave him a reception such as is generally accorded only to royal personages.

Budapest.—A new opera, entitled "Roland," by Count Geza Zichy, is in course of being mounted at the National Opera House. Count Zichy is an excellent musician and has acquired considerable fame as a pianoforte virtuoso, notwithstanding the fact of his being deprived of one arm. He was at one time director of the Budapest Opera.

Frankfort-on-Main.—Herr Humperdinck has written an overture to the melodrama "Die Königskinder," to which he has given the separate title of "Der Königssohn," and which will be first produced at the forthcoming production of the work in Berlin. He is now engaged upon the score of a new two-act opera, the subject of which has not yet transpired.

Gars (Lower Austria).—At her charmingly situated villa in this place the widow of Suppé, the composer of so many successful operettas, has arranged with much taste and care a collection of objects having reference to the career and personality of her late husband. Here are to be found, inter alia, the flute upon which he practised when a boy, the pianoforte he used, valuable gifts presented to him, autograph letters addressed to him by distinguished persons, together with a number of as yet unpublished compositions from his own pen. The "Suppé Museum," which is freely shown to visitors, is probably the first institution of the kind dedicated to the ephemeral glory of a composer of burlesque.

Geneva.—The Grand Théâtre commenced its new season on the 15th ult. One of the principal novelties, and one looked forward to with much interest by the musical community here, will be a four-act comic opera entitled "Sancho Pansa," by M. Jaques Dalcroze, the talented Genevese musician.

Ischl.—A commemorative tablet has been affixed to a house in the Salzburger Strasse bearing the following inscription in German: "The great tone-poet Dr. Johannes Brahms inhabited this house during twelve summers." The fact of his having written here a number of his minor vocal and chamber compositions might have been equally deserving of a record.

Leipzig.—Justizrath Dr. Röntsch has been provisionally appointed successor to the late Dr. Günther in the directorship of the Conservatorium.——Dr. Kretzschmar, the highly esteemed conductor of the Riedel-Verein, has been obliged, on account of continued ill-health, to resign his position at that famous institution. Herr Nicodé, the Dresden conductor, will take charge for the present.

Munich.—Herr Richard Strauss has declined the tempting offer made him by Herr Pollini, the Hamburg impresario, and, his moderate demands having been granted, remains attached to the Royal Opera here. The gifted conductor receives the title of first Capellmeister, with a salary of twelve thousand marks, his position at the Royal Theatre being made otherwise more secure.

Pesaro.—Signor Mascagni has completed the score of a symphonic work entitled "Melancolia," to be performed in connection with the approaching Leopardi celebrations.

Rome.—Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci" has been privately produced here recently as a simple drama, without the music, with such success that a number of Italian theatrical managers have since applied for the right of performing the work in this form. The composer, in this case, being his own librettist, can hardly be otherwise than gratified at this practical testimony of his ability as a dramatist, although it is hardly a compliment to his music.——Signor Spinelli, the composer of the successful "A basso Porto," is actively engaged upon a new opera, "La Trilogia di Dorina," to a libretto by Signor Illica, and the young Sicilian composer, Signor Floridio, whose recently produced first operatic work "Maruzza" is full of promise, has taken in hand a new opera dealing with an American subject.

Vienna.—Smetana's opera "Dalibor," with a German version of the libretto by Dr. Kalbeck, was produced for the first time at the Imperial Opera on the 4th ult., and exceedingly well received by a very numerous audience, in which the Czech element was, as a matter of course, largely represented. The work is undoubtedly a noble one, full of dramatic life and highly interesting musically, and if not destined, perhaps, to enjoy the same popularity here as the composer's charming "The Bartered Bride," will certainly maintain itself permanently in the répertoire of the Opera. The performance, under Herr Mahler's direction, was an excellent one in its every detail; Herr Winkelmann being an admirable representative of the semi-legendary Bohemian hero and Frau Sedlmair no less successful in the somewhat trying part of Milada, the ill-fated heroine.——Herr Carl Goldmark has completed the score of a new opera in two acts entitled "Die Kriegsgefangene" ("The Prisoner of War"), which will be brought out at the Imperial Opera during the present season. The subject of the new work is taken from ancient Greek heroic legend, with Briseïs, the favourite slave of Achilles, for its heroine.

Weimar.—The Grand-Ducal Theatre, so closely associated with the artistic activity of Goethe and Schiller in drama, and later on with that of Liszt in the sphere of opera, is, if rumour be correctly informed, destined shortly to disappear to make room for a building better adapted to modern requirements. It was here where many of the great dramas of Schiller and Goethe were first produced; it was here also where "Lohengrin"—of all Wagner's works the one which has gained the most unqualified admiration of the world—was brought out for the first time. Surely a house harbouring such traditions should be preserved, if possible, and a site be found elsewhere for the modern erection!

OBITUARY.

One of the most prominent composers of Bohemia, Karel Bendl, who, with Antonin Dvorák and the late Frederick Smetana, shared the distinction of having gained a recognised position for the Czech element in musical art, died on September 20, at Prague, in his sixtieth year. He was born at Prague on April 16, 1838, and made his early studies under his grandfather, a musician of some note. He afterwards became a pupil at the Prague Organ School, where he studied with distinction until 1858, and soon after obtained the first prize for a song on a national theme, which at once rendered him popular with his countrymen. After a brief sojourn in Amsterdam in 1864, where he was chorus-master at the Opera, and subsequently in Paris, he returned to his native Prague where he resided for the remainder of his life. Bendl's was a highly conscientious nature, and severe self-criticism was to him one of the first obligations of the creative artist. A staunch conservative in his art, he was, unlike his contemporary Smetana, scarcely, if at all, influenced by Wagner in his operatic productions—most of them written to Czech librettos—while a leaning to Meyerbeer is, on the other hand, distinctly traceable here and there. His first opera, "Leila," was brought out at Prague in 1868 and proved a distinct success. Amongst his subsequent lyrical stage works, forming part of the standing repertory of the Prague National Theatre, may be instanced "The Montenegrin," which obtained the prize in connection with the inauguration of that theatre; "Bretislav and Jitka," the comic opera "The Bridegroom," and the operetta "The Indian Princess." One of his last operas, "Dité Tábora," was awarded the grand prize of the Royal Bohemian Academy. Bendl, however, was a versatile composer, and his compositions include a number of orchestral works, notably a "Dithyramb," "Concert polonaise," a "Slavonic Rhapsody," pianoforte pieces, numerous songs (selections from which have been published in England in four volumes, including a number of gipsy songs) and choral works; amongst the latter, several cantatas for soli, chorus, and orchestra, and two masses. Not a few of these have become known and appreciated outside the composer's native country. His only chamber work, a string quartet, one of his latest compositions, has recently been made more generally known through its inclusion in their programme by the Bohemian quartet party. At the funeral, which took place on September 23, many of the notabilities of the Bohemian capital, including the directors of the Conservatorium and of the National Theatre, took part, and the crowd of spectators which lined the route of procession on either side testified to the general and mournful appreciation of the loss which the national art had sustained.

M. Taskin, the popular tenor of the Paris Opéra Comique, died in that capital on the 5th ult., at the age of forty-four. He made his début at the Opéra Comique in 1879, in "Haydée," with considerable success. After fifteen years' connection with the institution referred to, he retired from the lyrical stage in order to devote himself exclusively to his duties at the Conservatoire, where he held a professorship for dramatic singing. On the occasion of the disastrous fire at the Opéra Comique, in May, 1887, M. Taskin greatly distinguished himself by his courage and sang-froid, and was awarded the highest medal for saving human life in recognition thereof.

Joseph Fischer, a highly esteemed Brussels musician, died in that capital on September 21, at the advanced age of seventy-eight. He held for nearly fifty years the position of maître de chapelle at the Church of Sainte-Gudule, the choir of which he raised to a high degree of efficiency, and it was under his direction that important sacred works, such as Gounod's "St. Cecilia" Mass and Peter Benoit's Te Deum, obtained their first hearing in Belgium.

A composer of much promise, who had already obtained a not inconsiderable share of success, Léon Boellmann, died suddenly in Paris, on the 11th ult., at the age of thirty-five. He was an Alsatian by birth and studied at the Ecole Niedermeyer, in Paris, where he was a pupil more especially of M. Gigout, the well-known organist. Having early obtained a reputation as an organist and composer of talent, M. Boellmann was appointed to the important organistship of the Church of St. Vincent de Paul, in the French capital, where his performances invariably attracted numerous auditors.

The death is announced, on September 20, at Moscow, of Leone Giraldoni, professor at the Conservatoire in that town, and for many years previous to his accepting that post an operatic baritone of great celebrity. He made his début, in the latter capacity, at La Scala, Milan, in 1850, with enormous success, having already established a reputation previously in Spain, Portugal, and other Continental countries. In 1885 he retired, and soon after accepted the Moscow professorship for which his erudition as well as his proficiency as a vocalist well qualified him. He was born in Paris in 1824.

We have to record the death, on the 8th ult., in Berlin, of a well-known composer and musical author, Martin Plüddemann, aged forty-three. His compositions for male choruses are held in great esteem by German choral societies, and as a composer of Balladen he is looked upon as a worthy successor of Carl Loewe, pre-eminent in that particular form of German song.

We have also to record the following deaths :—

On September 15, at Berlin, Ludwig Bleuer, solo violinist of the Philharmonic Orchestra, one of the most distinguished pupils of Dr. Joachim, for some time leader of a quartet party in New York, aged thirty-three.

On September 18, at Indianopolis, Robert A. Newland, for many years organist and teacher at the Blind Institute there, a native of England.

On September 19, at Rome, Venceslas Persichini, vocal professor at the Royal Academia Santa Cecilia, aged seventy.

On September 24, in Paris, Madame Lefèvre, wife of M. Gustave Letèvre, the director of the Ecole Classique, and daughter of the composer M. Niedermeyer, aged sixty-five.

On September 25, at Stuttgart, Edmund Alwens, director of the Neue Musikschule, and professor at the Conservatorium, aged sixty-five.

On September 26, at Philadelphia, Michael Cross, a well-known organist and conductor, aged sixty-seven.

On September 28, at Frankfort-on-Main, Mdlle. Jo Kempees, operatic vocalist, of the Amsterdam Opera, aged twenty-nine.

On September 30, at New York, Ottilia Kiraly, operatic singer, a Hungarian by birth.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—On Sunday, the 3rd ult., the Harvest festival was held at the Parish Church. In the afternoon, before a crowded congregation, a recital was given on the fine old organ by Mr. G. F. Wrigley, who gave a capital performance of Guilmant's Sonata (No. 1) in D minor. Madame Jenny Holden (contralto) gave an artistic rendering of "God shall wipe away all tears" (Sullivan) and other solos. Mr. John Hulme (violinist) played Handel's Largo, and Mr. Charles Saunders also sang.

Auchinleck.—The new organ in the Parish Church, built by Messrs. Ingram and Co., was inaugurated, on the 4th ult., by Mr. J. B. Lawson, who played several pieces, including the unchurchlike "Gavotte" from Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon." Miss Campbell and Mr. John Thomson, of Kilmarnock, contributed some vocal solos with acceptance, and the church choir rendered valuable assistance in singing some anthems.

Barnet.—An exceptionally good and very interesting "Handel" concert was given on September 30, under the direction of Mr. Leonard Bevan, of Trent Park, which deserves special commendation. The programme contained some lesser known works by the Saxon master, as well as some more familiar. Some solos were admirably played by Mr. Leonard Bevan, on a harpsichord made by Jacobus Kirckmann in 1754, which instrument was also used to accompany some of the vocal and violin solos. Miss Florence Crane, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Cyril Streatfeild, and Mr. John Probert contributed the vocal solos with much acceptance, and Miss Lilian Wright was an excellent violinist.

Cape Town.—Mrs. McKay gave her annual concert, under the management of Mr. J. T. McKay, on September 22, in the Good Hope Hall, which was packed with an enthusiastic and appreciative audience. Vocal selections were rendered by Madame van der Veer Green, and Miss Alice Ivimy contributed solos on the violin and viola. Mr. Oscar Beringer also assisted in a duet for two pianofortes with Mrs. McKay, which was the instrumental gem of the evening. The concert opened with a quintet of Beethoven's for wind instruments and pianoforte. Mrs. McKay and Mr. Ambrose Comfort were the accompanists.

Cardiff.—Mrs. Alfred Morris delivered a very interesting lecture at the Cory Hall, with musical illustrations, the subject being "The Voice: its use and abuse," which she treated with admirable skill.

Eastbourne.—Miss Frances Wheatcroft gave a morning concert at the Town Hall, on the 16th ult., when she was assisted by Miss Alicia Jephson and Mr. Christian Blackett (vocalists), Miss Janie Crompton (solo pianist), and Mr. Arthur Cooper (accompanist). Miss Wheatcroft's voice was shown to excellent advantage in songs by Bellini, Meyerbeer, Goring Thomas, and the well-known "Irish Lullaby" by Alicia Needham. Miss Janie Crompton's pianoforte solos were a highly commendable feature of an enjoyable concert.

Frocester.—Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, organist of Gloucester Cathedral, gave an organ recital at Frocester Church on the 20th ult., in aid of St. Andrew's Chapel of Ease. Mr. Brewer played Handel's Concerto in G minor, Wagner's Bridal Procession music, Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, Merkel's Variations on a theme of Beethoven, "Prière et Berceuse" (Guilmant), and Liszt's "From crag to sea." The organ has been rebuilt and enlarged.

Grimsby.—A pianoforte recital was given in the Harbour of Refuge, on the 7th ult., by Master Joseph McCall, aged eleven years, a pupil of Mr. A. J. Lancashire. The programme, which was selected from the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Thalberg, Schumann, Godard, and Mendelssohn, was rendered by Master McCall very correctly and with remarkable expression. Mr. T. Willey sang two songs.

Henley-on-Thames.—A Harvest thanksgiving service was held in Holy Trinity Church, on the 7th ult., when a successful rendering of Sullivan's Festival Te Deum was given by the combined choirs of St. Mary's and Holy Trinity, conducted by Mr. J. H. Chalmers, organist of the church. The solos were admirably sung by Master William McLean, of the London Training School for Choristers, and Mr. W. G. Bayley, organist of St. Mary's, ably presided at the organ.

Hull.—A concert was given at the Royal Institution, on the 18th ult., at which the following artists performed: Miss Anita Sutherland, Mr. Charles Ellison, and Mr. John H. Ditchburn (vocalists); Mr. T. G. Buffey (violinist) and Miss Rosa B. Dixon and Mr. H. E. Nichol (pianists). Mr. Ditchburn sang Mr. Battison Haynes's capital song "The ould plaid shawl," Miss Dixon played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso," and Messrs. Nichol and Buffey performed the first movement of Rubinstein's Sonata in G for pianoforte and violin.

Ipswich.—A concert was given by Madame Teresa Tosti and her husband, M. Rudolphe Panzer, in the Ipswich Public Hall, on the 7th ult., in aid of the church building fund of St. John the Baptist at Felixstowe. It is now well known how the concert was organised. The curate of the church, the Rev. Charles Ward, anxious to raise funds for the building, adopted the novel expedient of playing a barrel-organ on the sands at Felixstowe. The public were attracted by the curious spectacle, and the subject was mentioned in the press, with the result that Madame Tosti wrote from Paris offering to come to Ipswich and, in conjunction with her husband, give a concert in aid of the church funds. M. Panzer played pianoforte pieces by Grieg, Chopin, Liszt, Schumann, and other composers; while Madame Tosti sang "Una voce," from the "Barber of Seville," the "Crusade," and the "Erl-King" (Schubert), and, in response to an encore, "Home, sweet home."

Kelvedon Hatch (Essex).—A thanksgiving service was held in the Parish Church of St. Nicholas, on the 1st ult., and at the same time the new altar rails were dedicated. There was full choral Evensong, the anthem being Maunder's "Sing to the Lord of Harvest." The honorary organist and choirmaster, Mr. H. Brandreth Gibbs, conducted, and the sub-organist, Miss Brandreth Gibbs, ably presided at the organ.

Lancaster.—The Lancaster Choral Society has decided to give Mr. Edward Elgar's "King Olaf" and Dr. Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens"——The Lancaster Orchestral Society at its annual meeting was able to record a balance in hand of nearly £10.——Mr. Wesley Martin, late organist of Caermarthen Parish Church, has commenced his duties as organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church.

Melbourne (Australia).—The monthly concert of the Musical Society of Victoria was held on August 28 at the Royal Arcade Rooms. The feature of the evening was the performance, for the first time at the Society's concerts, of Mozart's Clarinet Quintet. Mr. Oliver Jäger, a youthful son of the esteemed president of the Society, who made his first appearance as a clarinet player, was well supported by Messrs. Henry Curtis, Leonard Montague, E. A. Jäger, and A. Montague. Mr. T. J. Hammond and Mr. Henry Curtis gave an enjoyable rendering of Gade's Sonata for pianoforte and violin in D minor (Op. 21), Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor was well played by Miss Julia C. Sutherland, and Miss Charlotte Stokes and Mr. Hammond played Silas's clever Gavotte and Passepied for pianoforte duet. Songs by Dvorák, Dessauer, Schira, and other composers were sung by Miss Lucy Hunt and Miss Barbara Kenyon.

Middlesbrough.—The Middlesbrough Musical Union announces the following works to be performed during the coming season: Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, Dr. Hubert Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," Sir Frederick Bridge's "Inchcape Rock," and Mr. Edward Elgar's "King Olaf," conducted by the composer. An orchestral concert will be given by the Hallé orchestra, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen. The conductor of the society, Mr. N. Kilburn, deserves to be congratulated on such an excellent season's programme.

Petersham, Sydney (New South Wales).—In aid of the fund for providing new choir stalls for All Saints' Church, Gaul's sacred cantata "Ruth" was well performed in the church on August 25, when the choir was assisted by the Mission Church choir and other friends. The cantata was preceded by a short service and an address. The soloists were: Naomi, Miss Green; Ruth, Miss La Roche; Orpah, Miss Cookson; and Boaz, Mr. T. Kirby. Mr. William T. Wood conducted and Mr. William Angus presided at the organ.

Stocksbridge.—A most successful performance of Dr. Henry Coward's sacred cantata the "Story of Bethany" took place at the Church Schools, on the 4th ult., under the composer's able direction. The principal soloists were Mrs. Burgin (soprano), Mrs. E. H. Charge (contralto), and Mr. W. P. Lewis (bass). Mr. H. Moxon accompanied. Mr. J. Rodgers was principal first violin of the Stocksbridge Instrumental Society, and the choruses were sustained by the Stocksbridge Tonic Sol-fa Association.

Torquay.—A triple recital was given at the Bath Saloons on the 23rd ult., by the "Recital Trio" (Miss Ethel Barns, Miss Marie Olson, and Mr. Charles Phillips). Always providing a programme of high-class music, the annual visit of these artists was, as usual, warmly appreciated in Torquay. The programme included Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, Sonata for violin, by Porpora, and songs by Stradella, Schumann, Massenet, and Elgar, besides a group of old folk-songs.

Wellington (New Zealand).—The Orchestral Society gave the first concert of its eighth season in the Opera House, on August 17, under the direction of Mr. Maughan Barnett. The works performed included Beethoven's First Symphony, the overtures to "Life for the Czar" (Glinka) and "Fierrebras" (Schubert), a march by Lachner, a melodie of Paderewski, and selections from Rameau and Rubinstein. Miss Phœbe Parsons sang "Se sarauno Rose floriramio," by Arditi, and Tours's "Because of thee."——Mr. Maughan Barnett gave the second of his present series of organ recitals in St. John's Church on August 6, when the programme included the "St. Ann's" Fugue (Bach), Flute Concerto, first movement (Rinck), Guilmant's Marche funèbre and Chant seraphique, and other works.

Weston-super-Mare.—Mr. Walter Harvey Palmer, who has been organist of Emmanuel Church for the long period of thirty-nine years, has received some gratifying testimonials upon the occasion of his retirement from that office. The Vicar, the Rev. Prebendary Aldridge, presented Mr. Palmer with an illuminated address and a purse of gold (£20), and the choir also gave an address as a slight token of their "esteem and goodwill." Mr. Thomas Palmer, who had been a member of the choir of the church for fifty years, was presented by the parishioners with a gold watch "as a small token of their regard for him."

Organ Appointments.—Mr. William A. Montgomery, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Jedburgh, N.B.—Mr. Frank Wrigley, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Peter's Church, Seal, Sevenoaks.—Mr. Carolus King, Organist and Choirmaster to Claremont Chapel, Pentonville Road.—Mr. Albert Wood, Organist and Choirmaster to Bloomsbury Chapel (Baptist).—Mr. R. Frederic Tyler, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's Church, Surbiton.—Mr. Herbert Gresham, to St. Catherine's, Abercromby Square, Liverpool.—Mr. Albert Mellor, to the Parish Church, Windsor.—Master Edgar Ford, to St. Philip's Church, Penn Fields, Wolverhampton.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Rading.—Dr. Harford Lloyd's "Intermezzo," from his Organ Concerto in F minor, which was played at the Gloucester Musical Festival of 1895, is in MS. The Trio of Rhine Maidens, Wagner, is published by Messrs. Schott and Co. We regret that we cannot trace the other pieces by the titles you have given us.

C. H. W.—We most strongly advise you not to have your tendons cut. The consequences might be very serious. We cannot give the metronomic rates at which "great pianists" play the pieces you name. The straight jacket of the metronome is bound to be a misfit in such cases.

Musicus.—With all the best intentions possible, we really cannot suggest "a fair price (or thereabouts)" for the set of waltzes you have composed; nor can we state what is "the general remuneration" given for such compositions. There are so many contingencies.

N. S.—Your question can only be satisfactorily answered verbally. Consult a really good elocutionist. The general rule, and a very good one, is that the pronunciation of such words should be natural, perfectly free from all affectation, and very distinct.

M. D. (Claughton).—A new edition of Mr. Baptie's book was published by Messrs. Curwen and Sons this year. Have you not made some mistake in the name of the author of the "Dictionary of Violinists" you enquire about?

"The Cuckoo's Notes."—We have received several letters on this subject, following that which appeared in our last issue, but we regret that we cannot insert them owing to the exigencies of space.

Subscriber.—You will probably find the information for which you ask in Mr. Charles Sayle's book, "In Praise of Music," published by Mr. Elliot Stock, reviewed in our July number (p. 473).

Inquirer.—We regret that we cannot, at present, trace the Beethoven print you refer to, but we shall endeavour to do so, and let you know if we are successful.

Richmond.—We have not heard that the Rev. Baring-Gould's recitation, entitled "Bishop Benno," has been published with a pianoforte accompaniment.

B. M.—The words of "Where'er you walk" are by Pope. We gave some information on the subject in our issue of March last (p. 164).

MACDONALD SMITH'S SYSTEM.

("FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.")

"Likely to be one of the most valuable weapons which has been added to the armoury of the modern teacher during this century."—Sir Frederick Bridge.

RECENT TESTIMONY.

"I play old pieces infinitely better (without practice) than I used to when working at them."—G. P., London.

"I have done no finger studies of any sort since your instructions came, yet I can play ever so much better."—E., Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O.

"Difficulties which were once almost insurmountable now seem to fall to pieces as I play. The keyboard, which once seemed hard and unyielding, has now become like velvet to my fingers."—D. Parkes, Plymouth.

"Was afraid to play a piece in public. Now I have no fear at all. I play no technical exercises."—H., Mus. Bac.

"To me it has been a veritable godsend."—C. S. Parsonson, Mus. Bac.

"You were quite right in assuming that I was in the habit of playing with a limp arm. I have derived wonderful benefit from your hint on this point."—K., Belfast.

"I had decided to send this piece (Czerny's Toccata) with test passages marked, but on playing it to-day I find the difficulties have almost vanished."—C., L.R.A.M.

"My technique has improved wonderfully—nay, almost incredibly. . . I never feel the need of them (technical exercises) now; during the last few months I have done nothing of the sort."—C. T. R. Scott, Brussels.

"For lightness of touch I would not take off my hat to anybody. A lady said to me the other day that I must have practised a great deal to procure such a touch, and when I told her I did not practise at all at the keyboard, she looked dumbfounded."—W., F.R.C.O.

"I have found the system of the greatest possible use in teaching the piano, more particularly in the case of adult pupils, to many of whom music is now a delight instead of a toil as formerly. To teachers whose time is so fully occupied that they have no time for practice, Macdonald Smith's system is worth ten times the modest fee which he charges for lessons."—Chas. G. Bryan, Southport.

MAGNIFICAT

SET TO MUSIC FOR

SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.
String Parts (in the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The work is cast for choir with one soloist, a soprano, and is divided into five numbers, in the first and last of which both solo and choir are employed. In both these sections a prominent part is played by a short phrase taken from the plain song associated with the hymn. . . . It is first developed orchestrally in a passage which bears, as it were, the sign-manual of Parry in every bar, and the solo voice enters on an interrupted cadence, followed soon after by the choir in rich four-part polyphony. In addition to the main theme there is a jubilant subject in the dominant, which, in a symphonic movement, would be called the second subject; the chorus is worked upon these two with surpassing skill and effect. . . . The second soprano solo, "Fecit potentiam," reveals the hand of the author of "God breaketh the battle," in "Judith"; it is a worthy companion to that famous solo, and its climax, "Et divites dimisit inanes," gives it a variety and relief which the other may be said to lack. The final section, "Suscepit Israel," begins with a remarkably beautiful passage of six-part vocal harmony, and its climax is provided in a brilliant four-part fugue, "Sicut locutus est," the working of which is a masterpiece of learning, and which is yet so far from pedantry that it strikes the casual hearer as merely a triumphant close to the joyful strains of the hymn.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The new Magnificat I take to be one of his finest, as well as his ripest productions. . . . As usual with Dr. Parry, the music is close woven to an intricate pattern, which is, however, always clear. It marches—there can be no question about that—and takes us with it on the way to an imposing Coda, wherein the church theme comes back with augmented grandeur and effect. I should say that no finer chorus than this has been written for a long time; it delights the ear and exalts the feeling. There is not a bar of padding or commonplace from beginning to end, nor one which seems other than what in the nature of things it should be. This is high praise, and if I knew of words which could make it higher I would use them. . . . No. 3—"Et misericordia"—is a chorus with violin solo, a strain of the most tender and delightful nature, brimful of delight, and adorned by the violin with charmingly decorative passages. The choral writing is unpretentious, but far higher than technical tours de force is the sense of beauty and fitness which the music exhales as a flower its fragrance. It will probably be the favourite section. . . . The final number has a massive opening section in six parts, followed by a capital fugue on a diatonic scale subject, and ending with a Coda in which both the church theme and that of the fugue are introduced. So closes a work which helps to strengthen an impression that there are golden days in store for English music.

STANDARD.

His latest utterance must rank among his best in freshness and musicianship, if not in dimensions. . . . A truly delightful chorus in nine-eight measure, "Et misericordia," with a violin solo obbligato. The close, when the violin ascends to A in altissimo, is especially charming. Dr. Hubert Parry has never written anything better than this section of his new work. . . . The work comes to a close in a manner that could scarcely be made more imposing.

DAILY NEWS.

There is nothing of the advanced school in Dr. Parry's music to the canticle, which, indeed, more than once recalls the old masters. One phrase in the preliminary symphony, likewise used in the opening solo and chorus, curiously suggests a similar phrase in a Lutheran chorale which Mendelssohn has made popular. It is practically the motto theme of the "Magnificat," for it recurs at the end of the number, and again at the close of the whole work. . . . This noble example of British art deserves to be heard by the Albert Hall, or another of our "crack" choirs.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It has freedom, breadth, and spontaneity, each section being so vital to the whole that it could not be removed without serious injury to the work. How few are the compositions of our time, whether by British or foreign musicians, of which this can be said! . . . A work in which Dr. Parry's mastery of strong effects obtained by legitimate and always scholarly means is as patent as ever.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

An emphatic success has to be recorded. Laid out for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, Dr. Parry's work is thoroughly characterised by that happy union of strength, science, dignity, and energy which has long been associated with the products of his pen.

ATHENÆUM.

There is no perceptible falling off in the latest utterance of the gifted English composer, who, it may be said without much fear of contradiction, can claim equality with any musician now living. . . . No finer setting of the canticle has ever been penned.

ODE TO THE SEA

POEM

LAURENCE BINYON

SET TO MUSIC

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ARTHUR SOMERVELL.

Price Two Shillings.
Tonic Sol-fa Edition, One Shilling.

THE TIMES.

The treatment is so distinctively English that it cannot but recall some of Parry's choral odes in general design, as well as in certain features of workmanship. The second number contains a graceful passage in the style of a lullaby. The choral accompaniment to the solo voice gains a charm and an almost aerial quality from the fact that the tenors have the lowest part. The spirited chorus, "Mother of England," is a decidedly effective section, and the narrative portions are handled with considerable power. The most successful of these is in connection with a not very obvious reference to the siege of Leyden, but in respect of its contrasts and of the dignity of its general design the Ode leaves little to be desired.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Much of his instrumentation is happy, especially the overture, which is supposed to represent the vastness and mystery of the sea. . . . The first of the soprano solos deals with the voyage of Danaë, and towards the close the composer felicitously depicts the calm that follows the storm by means of a chorus of sopranos, altos, and tenors singing a lullaby, a gently rocking movement, in support of the soloist. Interest in the theme is revived by the sixth number, a solo with chorus, "In England's name." The finale of "While around our shores" is also vigorous, the musical material including part of the phrase of "Rule, Britannia," the use of which is warranted by the words.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Somervell's compositions have won the esteem of music-lovers by reason of their melodiousness and neat craftsmanship, and the respect thus gained will certainly not be lessened by his work produced this evening. . . . In its entirety the work shows much earnest endeavour and musicianly accomplishment.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Mr. Somervell's music is always serious, often interesting, and sometimes really beautiful. In illustrating the story of Danaë and her babe for whom the sea became so gentle a guardian, there is, for instance, a touch of genuine poetry, the soothing lullaby of the waves being beautifully suggested in the music.

STANDARD.

It opens exceedingly well with an overture in regular form, the second subject being extremely suave and melodious. This choral section is full of energy, and the third, "Fearful and vast," is noteworthy for a sweetly flowing theme at the words, "But soft the waters wild." The final chorus, "O, while around our shores," is entirely English in phraseology, and the suggestions felicitous.

GLOBE.

His music is essentially English, full of spirit and melody, and unfailing in its swing and vigour. Where, as in the lines of Danaë, the poet has suggested a different treatment, the composer has availed himself of the chance afforded him, and his music becomes full of lyric charm. The choral writing is decidedly effective, and the two solos, which were admirably sung by Madame Albani, provide an agreeable contrast just where it is required.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With this object in view a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption of rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

SIX ACTION SONGS
MARY HUTCHINSON
MUSIC BY
ALFRED R. GAUL.

"These delightful songs were written and composed for, and are affectionately dedicated to, the children of the Kindergarten Section of the Church of England College for Girls at Edgbaston. Were there naught else to recommend them, the six titles would invite for the songs universal acceptance. Who could resist 'Haymakers,' 'Fairy Bells,' 'Flower Fairies,' 'The English Flag,' 'Calling the Cows,' and 'Fishermen'? We confess to a desire to see some of these songs done as the accompanying 'rubric' suggests. In 'Haymakers' the boys should be scythe-carriers, their action that of mowing; the little girls should imitate raking. This, with the quaint and pretty melody, and the refrain, 'Work, work, clearly we call; work, work, steadily all,' must be a grateful vision to parents, and a pleasant recreation to children, who may thank their stars that they have been born in a day which has a Mary Hutchinson and an Alfred R. Gaul to further gild the golden hours of childhood."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

MIND AND VOICE

A STUDY OF DEVELOPMENT, ENSURING FREEDOM FROM HOARSENESS, VOCAL FATIGUE, OR LOSS OF VOICE FROM ORDINARY CAUSES.

By J. BARNARD BAYLIS.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

The Rev. R. FOTHERINGHAM, M.A., writes from Blackheath, S.E.: "A heavy Sunday's duty used to fill me with anxiety, and, towards the close of the day, I invariably suffered from huskiness in the throat and a sense of vocal fatigue. After following your instructions for a few months it was with delight I found these symptoms disappear, and now my voice is as strong and clear at the close as at the beginning. I am also conscious of much greater flexibility of voice and increased power in its control; and still more striking is the freedom from the difficulties usually attending a common cold."

BEETHOVEN

AND HIS

NINE SYMPHONIES

BY

GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

PRICE, CLOTH, GILT, SIX SHILLINGS.

"I recognise it, without the smallest hesitation, as one of the most important and valuable among recent contributions to musical literature. . . . The best informed of professional musicians may learn a great deal about the master-works of Beethoven from Sir George Grove, whose wide reading and acute perceptiveness have enabled him to marshal an astonishing array of facts, and whose intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the master has qualified him to throw light upon pages which, to many, are still obscure. . . . I must be satisfied with the remarks already made, earnestly recommending all who recognise Beethoven's greatness as shown in his immortal Symphonies to obtain Sir George Grove's volume, and walk in the luminous paths through which he is ready to conduct all who trust his guidance."—Daily Telegraph.

SET TO MUSIC FOR CHORUS (S.A.T.B.), ORCHESTRA, AND ORGAN

BY

EDWARD ELGAR.
(Op. 34.)

PRICE ONE SHILLING.
String Parts (in the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The composer has recently made remarkable strides in popular estimation, and in his latest work those characteristics of originality, force, and skill which have procured him his position are fully maintained. . . . The whole service is one of remarkable beauty and individuality.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Elgar's new settings of most familiar texts are quite of a festal character, having but little in common with what may be called the traditional, and still orthodox, form and spirit of English Church music. . . . Happy, as I think, in their construction, these pieces are perhaps even more fortunate in the power and value of their expression. The composer is not, as Wagner said of Berlioz, crushed by the ruins of his own machines. They may be more elaborate than is usual in such a case, but they come to no grief, and involve their inventor in none. Every force is directed straight to the end of expression, which shall be appropriate, powerful, and clear. I cannot say that the mark is ever absolutely missed, and I must express an opinion that it is generally hit plumb in the centre. To my mind, indeed, the new works are a succession of effects which more and more absorb attention, and more and more tend to the conviction that one is hearing music in which are some at least of the elements of greatness. . . . Mr. Elgar's new compositions are, of their kind, masterpieces, and such as compel me to await the further development of the Malvern musician's career with augmented confidence.

MORNING POST.

It is a masterly work. The theme which opens the orchestral introduction, and on which the composition may be said to be built, is striking and powerful, and it is subsequently treated in a most skilful and effective manner. The voices are much used in unison against this initial theme given out by the orchestra, but in several places they are written for in four parts, unaccompanied, with beautiful effect. There are also some well-conceived imitatory vocal passages, and now and again the voices are in five and six parts. Great intensity of emotion marks the setting of the intercessory portions of the hymn, and the announcement of the final words is most impressive. . . . The music allied to the Benedictus is naturally more suave and flowing than that written for the Te Deum, but the themes of the latter are cleverly utilised in the former, and with such deft alterations in tempo and treatment that the music finely expresses the spirit of blessing and peace which pervades the text.

STANDARD.

The Te Deum opens with a figure which is used with such persistency that the listener is reminded of the methods of Dvorák. Other themes are, of course, introduced, and the whole feeling of the composition is dramatic, with masterly part-writing for the voices and glowing orchestration. . . . Mr. Elgar's masterly work is equally suitable for the church and the concert-room, and it should be heard in London at the earliest opportunity.

Hymn of Thanksgiving
FOR
THE QUEEN'S LONG REIGN
(1837-1897)

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

CHARLES HARFORD LLOYD.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

String Parts (in the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The work conforms, strictly speaking, to the type of "chorale-cantata," of which Bach left so many glorious examples. Not a German chorale, but a typically English hymn-tune—viz., "Bedford," one of the finest of the eighteenth century tunes—has been taken as the ground-work of the composition, at least as far as concerns the choral portions. . . . This fine hymn or cantata is certain to win a place among festal works to be used at all joyful seasons.

MORNING POST.

The work opens with a suave instrumental introduction, which in its melodious and complacent character indicates the nature of the music which follows. This commences with a choral fugue which is developed with much ingenuity and command of the usual resources of counterpoint. A soprano solo well laid out for the voice follows, and then the tenor soloist gives out the special sentences for the Queen, and is answered in harmony by the choir, accompanied by a melodious figure on the strings, the choir towards the close being divided into eight parts with impressive effect. A duet for soprano and tenor affords a good contrast to the preceding number, and the final chorus comprises an opening and concluding portion in eight parts and a well-written fugue.

STANDARD.

Dr. Lloyd's ability as a writer and a musician generally is too well known to need description, and it may be said without further preface that his latest work is one of conspicuous merit, worthy of performance by either large or small choral societies.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The "Hymn of Thanksgiving" is distinguished for its symmetry of form and melodic charm. Opening with a graceful instrumental introduction for strings, the cantata has for its first number a new choral setting of Tate and Brady's version of the first verse of the 34th Psalm, in which effective use is made of a chorale of the old hymn-tune known as "Bedford." A soprano solo then follows, the concluding section of which is marked by a serenity admirably fitted to the words. To this succeeds a brief litany in which flowing phrases for the tenor solo are answered antiphonally by the male voices of the chorus, the number concluding with a brief but charming unaccompanied choral passage in eight parts. The ensuing duet for soprano and tenor is of a more animated character, and the work concludes with a fine chorus in solid eight-part harmony, leading into a vigorous fugue, and culminating in a chorale in which the tune of "Bedford" is given out by the chorus in unison to a florid orchestral accompaniment, in which the fugue is re-introduced with the happiest results.

BLAXLAND'S SOLO BOYS

Experienced. Reliable. Artistic.

For Church Festivals, Concerts, Banquets, &c.

MASTER WILLIE CHILD (Soprano)

Solo Boy at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, Farm Street, W., and at St. Mary's, Stoke Newington (Evening).

A clever and artistic solo singer, with a voice of exquisite quality and great compass.

Master CHILD has had an experience unsurpassed in the Standard Works (Latin and English words), and is acknowledged by competent judges (vide testimonials) to be a singer of the most exceptional merit.

The following are selected from recent testimonials (October, 1897):—

From Madame ALBANI (Re Master WILLIE CHILD).

"When I heard him the other day, I thought he had a beautiful voice, and his singing gave me and my friends a great deal of pleasure, and I think that he is worthy of all encouragement. With my best wishes for his success." (Signed) E. ALBANI GYE.

October 12, 1897.

From Madame JANOTHA, Court Pianist to H.I.M. the German Emperor.

"Little Willie Child sings like an angel. The 'Ave Maria' was an exquisite 'prayer.' The voice is beautiful, the feeling is artistic. It gives a great joy to listen to him." (Signed) JANOTHA.

October 13, 1897.

From HENRY T. PRINGUER, Mus. Doc., Oxon., F.R.C.O., Organist, St. Mary's, Stoke Newington, Conductor of Trinity College (London) Choir, &c., &c.

"I have had many opportunities of judging of Master Willie Child's capabilities as a solo vocalist, both in sacred and secular music, and he is undoubtedly a perfect little artist. His voice is wonderfully sweet and of very good compass, and the high intelligence and extraordinary pathos that characterise all his renderings are most surprising in one so young, and perfectly satisfy the requirements of the musical critic quite apart from his years. He is a perfect pleasure to listen to in every way." (Signed) HENRY T. PRINGUER.

September, 1897.

From ARTHUR T. ROBINSON, Mus. Bac., Oxon.

"I have much pleasure in saying that Master Willie Child sang the solo part in Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and other solos, and that his beautiful voice and the manner in which he used it was an artistic treat of the highest kind. We hope to hear him again."

Buxton, October 7, 1897. (Signed) A. T. ROBINSON.

From Signor CAPRILE.

"In my experience of a good many years, I can truly say I never heard such a pure and sympathetic voice in a boy, combined to such an artistic and highly refined style. This is not my opinion alone, but is shared by all my friends, who, like myself, are delighted by his beautiful rendering of anything he attempts." (Signed) U. CAPRILE.

October 18, 1897.

Master STANLEY MARCHANT
Master WILLIE GAMMAGE
Master PERCY HALE
Master HERBERT HARDEN
Master WILLIAM McLEAN
Master ALBERT RUSSELL

can be very strongly recommended for all kinds of solo work.

RECENT PRESS NOTICES.

London City Press, Oct. 16, 1897.—"In the solo 'With verdure clad' the exquisite voice, perfect execution, and sympathetic feeling of Master Willie Gammage were beyond all criticism."

Musical News, Oct. 16, 1897.—"The solos (Sullivan's Festival Te Deum) were very beautifully sung by Master William McLean."

Hereford Mercury, Sept. 15, 1897.—"The anthem in the Cathedral, on Sunday last, was Wesley's 'Wilderness,' which was beautifully sung, Master Stanley Marchant's voice in the soprano solos being exceedingly sweet and bell-like."

Folkestone Herald, Aug. 28, 1897.—"The vocal numbers were contributed by three London choristers, and very beautifully did the boys sing. Master Stanley Marchant, who sang 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' is a boy artist, and his notable voice is only equalled by his natural and wonderful expression. Master Percy Hale sang in praiseworthy style 'With verdure clad,' and Master Willie Gammage created a great impression by his artistic rendering of 'Angels ever bright and fair.' The pure voices of the boys blended marvellously well in the duets 'In His hands' (Mendelssohn), 'O lovely peace' (Handel), and the trio from the 'Elijah,' 'Lift thine eyes.'"

Essex County Standard, Aug. 23.—"The singing of Masters Albert Russell and Willie Gammage was most enchanting."

Essex Telegraph, Aug. 7, 1897.—"Master Stanley Marchant has a full mellow voice, and sings with delightful life and expression, every word being beautifully pronounced; and Master Gammage is also a vocalist in whom the powers of culture and finish seem almost marvellous for one so young."

RECENT TESTIMONIALS.

"Having engaged Master Stanley Marchant on many occasions, I am happy to bear testimony to the sweetness of his voice and the charm of his sympathetic singing."—WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS, Principal, Guildhall School of Music, May 20, 1897.

"The Duchess of Albany was delighted with the singing of Master Willie Gammage, and his manners to H.R.H. were simple, unaffected, and courteous."—(Signed) Hon. RICHARD MORECOMBE, April 9, 1897.

"Your boys are excellent."—Sir FREDERICK BRIDGE, Conductor, Royal Choral Society, June 30, 1896.

The sixty Chorus Boys who have been so brilliantly successful at the Queen's Hall Oratorio Concerts, conducted by Mr. Randegger, are available for engagements.

The principal London critiques on the Boys' singing at the Queen's Hall Oratorio Concerts:—

The Times, Jan. 4, 1897.—"The choir, materially assisted by a contingent of boys from the London Training School for Choristers, were more than admirable in every way, their quality of tone, power of expression, and precision of attack being as remarkable as they are uncommon."

Daily Telegraph, Jan. 24, 1896.—"The choruses gained in effect through the strengthening of the choir by a contingent of boys from the 'London Training School for Choristers,' whose bright young voices were heard to much advantage."

Morning Post, April 4, 1896.—"In speaking of the choir mention should be made of the excellent singing of the contingent of boys from the London Training School for Choristers."

Standard, Feb. 24, 1896.—"The sopranos and contraltos were reinforced by a large contingent of boys from the London Training School for Choristers. The bright, fresh voices of the juvenile singers blended excellently with those of the female executants."

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
DECEMBER 1, 1897.

MENDELSSOHN'S DRAWINGS.

Next to his music and musicianship, Mendelssohn is best known as a letter-writer—in fact, it is generally admitted that he was a master of epistolary art. But there is another attribute of his artistic nature which is practically unknown, at least to the general public. We refer to the remarkable facility with which he handled pencil, pen, and brush, resulting in numerous sketches, drawings, and water-colours, affording further proof, if proof were wanting, of the rare combination of gifts with which nature had endowed him. In this connection we cannot do better than quote from the ever versatile and sympathetic pen of Sir George Grove, who pays a high tribute to Mendelssohn the artist in the following words:*

"Drawing with him was more like a professional avocation than an amusement. The quantity of his sketches and drawings preserved is very large. They begin with the Swiss journey in 1822, on which he took 27 large ones, all very carefully finished and all dated, sometimes two in one day. The Scotch and Italian tours are both fully illustrated, and so they go on year by year till his last journey into Switzerland in 1847, of which 14 large, highly finished water-colour drawings remain, besides slighter sketches. At first they are rude and childish, though with each successive set the improvement is perceptible. But even with the earliest ones there is no mistaking that the drawing was a serious business. The subjects are not what are called 'bits,' but are usually large comprehensive views, and it is impossible to doubt that the child threw his whole mind into it, did his very best, and shirked nothing. He already felt the force of the motto which fronted his conductor's chair in the Gewandhaus—'Res severa est verum gaudium.' Every little cottage or gate is put in with as much care as the main features. Every tree has its character. Everything stands well on its legs, and the whole has that architectonic style which is so characteristic of his music."

Most of Mendelssohn's drawings and sketches are in the private collections of his relatives and friends or their descendants, and are naturally very much prized as personal relics of the composer. His elder daughter, the late Mrs. Benecke, for instance, had a book full of pencil sketches of his journeyings in England, Scotland, and Wales, in 1829, all executed with rare skill. Thanks, however, to the kindness of the sons of two of Mendelssohn's friends—both of them artists and bearing honoured names in music—Mr. John Callcott Horsley, R.A., and Mr. Felix Moscheles—we are enabled to present our readers with three characteristic specimens in fac-simile of Mendelssohn's skill in water-colour painting and pen and ink sketching.

Mr. Horsley, who kindly offered to lend the two water-colours which have been very carefully reproduced in colours, forming two of our Supplements, sends us the following explanation of these treasures in his possession:

"Mendelssohn was an enthusiastic sketcher and draughtsman. His work with pen and pencil shows the singular earnestness with which he pursued it, but he never exhibited that readiness, so frequently developed by amateur artists, to leave off when difficulties arise. Contenting himself with the simple materials of pencil and paper, he made most elaborate studies of Alpine and other scenery, and from intricate architectural subjects, with the point of a crayon alone. He more rarely used water-colour, as he has done in the two views in Leipzig, now successfully reproduced in chromo-lithography from the original drawings. The first of these sketches, made in London from memory in 1844, is that of a farm house on some landed property belonging to the Mendelssohn family in the outskirts of Leipzig, but now included in the city; and the gardens and land of the old place, covered by streets and houses, are completely swept away. The snow effect in this charming little drawing is rendered with true artistic feeling, notably so in the colour of the snow, and the difference of its tone in its

Nov. 30. '97.

My dear Moscheles,

Pray forgive my delay in doing the little piece of business with which you entrusted me: an unexpected claim on my mornings interfered with it, till just now. Will this answer your purpose anyway?

Hail to the Man who upward strives
Ever in happy unconcern:
Whom neither praise nor blame contrives
From his own Nature's path to turn.

On and still on, the journey wends,
Yet has he kept us all in view —
Working in age with youth's intent,
In living-fresh, in loving-true.

Were my version but as true to the original as your Father's life was to his noble ideal, it would be good indeed — as it is, accept the best of untouched condition on the roofs of the buildings, compared with that of its trodden state in the frequented roadway. His observation and memory are shown in his not forgetting to indicate snow on the roof of the cab passing along luggage-laden. His ever-present genial fun and humour are shown by his adopting an English publisher's style of dedication, in the few words he has written on the drawings, relating to the dear friend for whom they were made, at a time when she was a grievous sufferer, and in whose family they are still preserved as household treasures. How delighted he was at the amusement he felt and expressed at his decorating himself with a baronetcy, playing upon his own name,

'Bartholdy,' for the abbreviation 'Bart.' The other sketch represents (on the right) the house in which he and his family were living when he was summoned to 'perfect peace' and rest in the 'everlasting arms.' This drawing is not of so marked a character as its companion, but the central portion is quite beautiful in its refined completion."

We are greatly indebted to Mr. Felix Moscheles, son of the eminent pianist and the attached friend of Mendelssohn, Ignaz Moscheles, for kindly allowing us to reproduce in fac-simile the humorous and highly characteristic pen and ink sketch by Mendelssohn, the reproduction not only being practically the same size as the original, but also printed on paper the same colour as that used by the composer. We are further favoured by a description of this jeu d'esprit from the pen of Mr. Felix Moscheles himself, Mendelssohn's godson, who writes as follows:

"One of the most delightful traits of Mendelssohn's character was a certain brightness, it might be called naïveté, which enabled him to appreciate the humour of a situation and thoroughly to enjoy it with his friends. He would turn some trivial incident to the happiest account, and, in his own peculiarly genial way, make it the starting-point for a standing joke or a winged word to be handed down from generation to generation in the families of his friends. In his letters there is plenty of evidence of this bright side of his nature; there too we find many a happy thought taking the shape of a sketch or a finished drawing, or at times an illustration, such as the one which is the subject of these lines. It is taken from my mother's album, and is but one of many treasured in our family, all bearing testimony to the facility with which he handled pen and pencil.

"To explain the origin of this drawing here reproduced, I cannot do better than transcribe what my mother wrote in the diary of my father (she often held the pen for him) on May 29, 1832:—

Mendelssohn dined with us. Unknown to Moscheles, I had invited the Haizingers, Schröder-Devrient, Hauser, and Klingemann to come in the evening and celebrate to-morrow's birthday. Mendelssohn had composed a Canon which was to be sung by those German friends, and, as to-morrow's performance of 'Fidelio' prevented their coming on the right day, we had to anticipate the celebration. Klingemann had written the words for the Canon; Mendelssohn wrote them out in pencil and Emily* traced them in ink. Then, genius as he is, Mendelssohn drew arabesques, framing the lines and illustrating Moscheles's works; 'The fall of Paris,' for instance, he depicts literally, showing the falling city, etc. The drawing was brought in as a parcel just arrived, and when he (Moscheles) had had time to enjoy the surprise, Mrs. Haizinger recited a prologue written by Klingemann, and explaining why the birthday was kept on that evening. Directly afterwards followed the beautiful Canon, in which the theme of Moscheles's first Concerto in C major persistently comes to the front. The rest of the evening was spent in the most delightful manner, for they all, together, or each in turn, played and sang most beautifully.

* Emily (Mrs. Roche), Moscheles's eldest daughter, then five years old.

"Mendelssohn explains that: 'The writing is the work of Emily Moscheles, the 29th of May, 1832. The poem is by Carl Klingemann, 37, Bury Street, St. James's. The Arabesques are invented, and the ink blots executed by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, for the time being in London.' At the top of the page he inscribes the words: 'Congratulations on the 30th of May, '32.' He begins his catalogue of my father's works by the 'Alexander March,' or 'Fall of Paris,' the piece which first established his reputation in Vienna; the drawing shows the towers of Notre Dame, the Panthéon, and other monuments collapsing. Then come Variations on the popular air, 'Au clair de la Lune,' Mendelssohn showing the actors in the familiar scene, with the legend, 'Pen, Moon, Candle.' Next we see him at the pianoforte, trying to master the first of the three 'Allegri di Bravura' (Op. 51), by Moscheles, 'dedicated to J. B. Cramer, in London.' 'How a young Berliner practises,' he writes beneath. The musical quotation in E flat, headed "Respect," refers to an occasion when, at a rehearsal, my father had great difficulty in getting the drums tuned to his satisfaction. Next Mendelssohn quotes the opening bars of a piece composed for the 'Album de Mons. Felix † † †.' Then the subject of the G minor Concerto is marked "Malinconico" and accompanied by a legion of 'Blue devils'! The themes and illustrations of the 'British Grenadiers' and 'The last rose of summer' speak for themselves. The demons fighting with pitchforks illustrate the 'Conflict of Dæmons,' No. 23 of my father's Pianoforte Studies (Op. 70). The orchestra is next shown playing his Symphony in C, first performed on May 8, 1829, during Mendelssohn's first visit to London. The Scotchman, with his full-blown bagpipes, takes us, in conclusion, to the Scherzo alla Scozzese, from the trio dedicated to Cherubini (Op. 84). Mendelssohn's birthday wishes culminate in the hope of my father's writing his twentieth symphony and of his living to the beginning of the twentieth century!"

We also reproduce, on the opposite page, a fac-simile of a letter addressed to Mr. Felix Moscheles by Robert Browning, in which the poet gives an English version of the lines encircled by Mendelssohn's design, as also of those which followed in 1844, as a continuation of the "friendly musical catalogue."

VICTORIAN MUSIC.

VIII.—Chamber Music.

As the year of Jubilee is nearly at an end, I close these papers, which have run through it, with a glance at the only great division of the art that remains for notice.

Not unnaturally, perhaps, many persons have an idea that the cult of chamber music began with the establishment of Mr. John

Ella's Musical Union and the foundation of Mr. Chappell's "Pops." Behind these important institutions few people take the trouble to look, and I want to show, in the first place, that when the Queen began to reign, quartet concerts, and the like, were not unknown in the metropolis. Indeed, having regard to the progress of musical education between then and now, those entertainments were, proportionately, almost, if not quite, as numerous as they are now. I turn to the record of the season 1837, and on one of the earliest pages read of a Quartet Concert given by Messrs. Blagrove, Gatti, Dando, and Lucas, in Hanover Square Rooms, "to a very full audience." "The principal feature in the bill," says the scribe, "was Beethoven's much-talked of posthumous Quartet. (Which?) With all its many phrases and passages of distinguished beauty, we must honestly confess that hitherto we have not been able to perceive any distinctness or continuity of design in this singular composition. The fault probably lies with ourselves, and most willingly would we prefer it should be so than that a great man should underwrite himself." The point is, not the critic's perplexity, but that one of the most abstruse works in music had a "very full audience" in unmusical London sixty years ago. On the same page I read that Litolff, Remy, and Richardson were delighting the members of the Marylebone Literary and Scientific Institution. Those were the young days of such societies, and they went the youthful pace, as may be supposed from the engagement of artists like Litolff and others. There were also Classical Chamber Concerts, so-called, in London, the managers of which gave a series of performances. At one of them a Rasoumowsky Quartet, Mozart's Quintet in D and Pianoforte Trio in B flat, together with a double Quartet by Spohr were played, the executants being Mori, Tolbeque, Lindley, Dragonetti, and other artists of eminence in their day. Moscheles was at that time giving soirées of chamber music, at one of which were performed a selection from Bach's Preludes and Fugues and Handel's Suites, a number of Scarlatti's "Lessons" (played on the harpsichord), and the "Kreutzer" Sonata. I read also of a series of Quartet Concerts, so-called, and find in the programme of one performance such works as Mozart's Quartet in D, Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 59), and the same master's Trio in G for strings. These were played by Blagrove, Gatti, Dando, and Lucas. In addition to the foregoing there were, during the season, a host of chamber concerts given by individual artists. "Benefits" were then in vogue, and such performers as Blagrove, Mori, and Mrs. Anderson regularly gathered their friends around them to share in a "feast of fat things"—good and improving music. Nothing can be clearer than that the amateurs of chamber music in London were in particularly good circumstances sixty years ago. It is beyond question that they had nothing of which to complain. There was an abundance of concerts, the programmes were excellent, and the artists were to match.

So much activity, though more or less of a sporadic kind, could not but lay the foundations of some stable enterprise, and only seven years later—that is to say, in 1844—the Musical Union was established. It must certainly appear curious to those who now contemplate a past in which they did not share, that chamber music should owe so much to an impresario whose success was certainly not due to any artistic talent of his own. John Ella was known to the last generation of orchestral players as a somewhat indifferent violinist, who, as far as I can discover, never did anything notable in any branch of creative or executive art. But he was a very shrewd and clever man all the same. While yet playing a second violin at Covent Garden, he, so the story goes, begged Costa to give him a first, because the old Duke of Wellington faced him as he sat, and distracted his attention by making signs to him. It was neither shrewd nor clever, perhaps, thus to "try on" with Costa, who promptly declined to comply; but the alleged action of Mr. Ella was true to the nature of the man. He was resolved to succeed somehow, and transferred himself to the "cold shade of aristocracy," in which frigid region he prospered remarkably well. Whether the noblemen and gentlemen around whom he hovered with ready smiles and a flexible back saw through him or not, I cannot say. The truth is, however, that the second violinist's blandishments secured many titled patrons, whose names were by no means kept in the background. Exploiting a foible of the day, Mr. Ella professed the greatest contempt for English music and musicians. Apropos, Mrs. Diehl tells us, in her recently published reminiscences, that he said to her: "You cannot come out here (in London) without credentials. You must go to Paris." The hall-mark of French society was indispensable. Without it nothing in art could be considered genuine, and Ella fostered the notion. Mrs. Diehl adds: "But Ella was useful. Although he was the avowed enemy of British art. . . . he was an inducement to foreign virtuosi to visit England, and English audiences heard many great artists they might never otherwise have known of except by hearsay. For the Musical Union was a bait; a promise of further cheques."

Ella's concerts were first given in Willis's Rooms, and in their arrangement and carrying out the impresario emphatically asserted his cleverness. By placing his scarlet-covered and flower-decked platform in the middle of the hall, he was able to surround his artists with concentric rings of auditors, whose social importance, greatest near the performers, faded off to the infinitesimal in the persons of a few critics. It was popularly supposed that the inmost circle consisted exclusively of dukes and duchesses, with, of course, Mr. Ella himself, who was "quite bridegroom-like in his dark blue frock coat, light tie, and spotless lavender kid gloves." "To see him at his best," writes Mrs. Diehl, "was to see him escorting some lady star from abroad to the piano, or seated airily conversing with some important dowager on the front bench, one of those ladies irreverently termed 'Ella's Duchesses' by youthful members of the Union less socially important; or, still better, when he was standing or sitting where he could be the observed of all observers during the performance, beating time, wagging his head, or glancing rapturously upward. Advertising his artists on the programme, he advertised their current performance by acting his admiration. With the exception of a few recusants in the back seats, Ella's auditors accepted Ella's artists at Ella's valuation." These, of course, were the tricks of a showman, but Ella did more worthy things. It has been claimed for him that he invented the analytical programme. That is not quite true, but the credit belongs to him of having established it as a useful companion to the hearing of classical music. His crowning grace is, however, that, never mind by what means, he invested chamber music and its concerts with the glamour of the "hupper suckles." Englishmen so dearly love a lord, and are so ready to imitate him, that this may be considered a very important achievement indeed. The Musical Union had, I believe, a library, but all I know about it comes from the testimony of Mr. Sutherland Edwards, who once said, in the Pall Mall Gazette, that members had the privilege of contributing thereto. After a fairly long and undoubtedly useful life, the Musical Union broke up and passed into limbo. Mr. Ella was getting old; music had become democratised, and the aristocracy less exclusive.

Quite as remarkable as the rise of the Musical Union from the ambition, social and other, of a "second fiddle," were the circumstances out of which sprang the Monday Popular Concerts—the institution which represents the next great step in the advance of chamber music during the present reign.

There was an old publisher, Chappell,
Who with cattle-show concerts would grapple, sang the late "Charley" Kenney in nonsense verse. My memory is probably not accurate as to the remainder of the stanza—

But the hall didn't fill,
"We'll peg away still,
And try with Beethoven," said Chappell.

In this rude rhyme the main facts as to the origin of the "Pops" are stated. The story is familiar, and I need only call to recollection that when concert-givers, with the strangely conservative instincts of Englishmen, declined to patronise the new St. James's Hall, Messrs. Chappell and Co., who had an interest in the building, proceeded to give entertainments on their own account, and laid themselves out to do so in a special manner during the week of the Cattle Show. No great success resulting, it became a question what further steps should be taken. In reply, the late J. W. Davison boldly suggested a trial of classical chamber music, convinced, as he often told me in later years, that with cheap tickets, an audience, by-and-bye remunerative, could be got together. The experiment was made, without changing the name of the concerts from "Popular" to anything else, and, after some inevitable years of loss, the enterprise seemed established in public favour. Established it certainly was, seeing that the season now in progress is the fortieth and that more than 1,600 performances have been given. It was once said that, instead of changing the title of his concerts, Mr. Arthur Chappell changed public taste and made the classical popular. To a considerable extent that is true, and no higher service has ever been done to music in this country. Let us not forget, however, that the happy result flowed from an accidental cause which was not in the first intention of the promoters. Had concert-givers taken kindly to the new hall, instead of avoiding it, Messrs. Chappell would probably not have intervened. Had the firm's original concerts succeeded, there would have been no thought of an experiment so Quixotic as that which followed. So one may apparently trace a controlling hand—

There is a divinity which shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will.

The "Pops," as the new enterprise came affectionately to be called, caused a revolution in more than one important respect. They put an end to the exclusiveness of high prices and exploded the idea that chamber music belonged chiefly to dilletanti. Even Mr. Ella's select sheepfold was broken up by their influence, though only after a long struggle. The inner circle lay open to the public at large, even to the man with only a shilling in his pocket. What the "Pops" have done in their forty years of existence no amateur needs telling. One has only to think of the eminent artists who have been, and still are, heard in St. James's Hall; of the two concerts per week during nearly six months in every year, and of the great audiences which for the most part they command, in order to recognise a potent influence.

I would now direct the reader's attention to a matter not less satisfactory than the present devotion to chamber music. It lies in the nature of the music itself; its freedom from reckless changes, and, as a corollary, its general adhesion to the rules of the great masters who brought this branch of the art to its highest perfection. It would, of course, be absurd to say that chamber music has not felt the influence of the modern spirit. Everyone knows that it has, but the fact nevertheless remains that the general form and character which the masters gave to it are substantially unchanged. The quartets of Mozart and Beethoven, of Mendelssohn and Schumann, are still the models of composers, even of those whose utterances are most individual. So the tide of change sweeps past chamber music, leaving it comparatively unaffected. If asked to give a reason for this I should point to the abstract nature of such music. The "programme" has not entered into it, as into orchestral compositions, where considerations extraneous to art control form and expression alike, often with disastrous results. It must be noted also that the limited resources of chamber music, as compared with those of the orchestra, tend to keep that branch of the art subject to purely artistic considerations, as distinct from mere physical effects. Hence the composer of a string quartet, for example, works under an obligation to observe some well-considered musical form, and to rely upon pure melody combined with musicianly skill in treatment and device. In short, the expressive qualities of chamber music are found in music alone and have nothing to do with what is extraneous. To this we owe the stability of its forms and its general freedom from violent changes of all kinds. The sensationalist can do little in the chamber. He must there be musicianly or nothing, and he is generally nothing.

To the extent in which chamber music keeps itself apart from influences not strictly musical should we set special store by it. It is a "city of refuge" for the art which, in other cities, encounters forces that tend to demoralisation. There the musician is free to be musical. No temptations whisper to him with siren voices. He finds no inducement to degrade his art in order to catch the applause of the ignorant and vulgar. "Programmes" are nothing to him there, for the region is far removed from the concerns and events of life. It is a region into which nothing extraneous rightfully intrudes, not even another art, and it remains abstract, infinite, isolated, like the soul which finds in it the highest of all delights.

MUSICAL REFORMATORIES.

By the courtesy of a distinguished sociological philanthropist, who for the time being desires his name to be kept a secret, we are enabled to lay before our readers the outlines of an important and entirely novel scheme for accelerating the advent of the moral millennium.

This is nothing less than the establishment of what he describes as a Musical Reformatory, in which the obsolete and inhuman methods of the crank and treadmill, oakum picking and solitary confinement will be replaced by an elaborately graded system of musical punishments.

It is a notorious fact that everyone, no matter how cultivated or uncultivated his musical instincts may be, can be made to suffer tortures by musical means. These of course vary in every individual case, and the procedure under the new penal code will involve the testing of the offender with a view to ascertaining his peculiar musical aversion, on the discovery of which, sentence will be passed in proportion to the gravity of the offence and the power of endurance of the culprit.

In some cases this preliminary investigation is obviously unnecessary. For example, it is notorious that burglars, bargees, and butchers are devoted to simple ballads, but that they experience incredible agony on listening to the posthumous quartets of Beethoven. Indeed, it is computed by Professor Vallombroso that more suffering can be inflicted on a healthy bandit by forcing him to listen to classical chamber music for two hours on end than by condemning him to six months' solitary confinement. On the other hand, it is equally notorious that the whole tribe of Wagnerolaters regard a ballad concert as anathema maranatha. Suppose then, to take a concrete example, that an unscrupulous financier has forged a cheque for £50,000, or been guilty of embezzlement on a Jabezian scale, and is known or proved to be a devout disciple of the Bayreuth master—let it never be forgotten by those who seek to discover an indissoluble bond between music and morality that Nero conclusively proved in his person the possibility of a complete divorce between virtue and virtuosity—then instead of being incarcerated for seven or fourteen years, he will be amply punished by being ordered to attend three ballad concerts a week for three months, at which every number in the programme is encored. Robbery with violence will no longer be punished with the lash. If the criminal can be shown to possess a refined and fastidious musical taste he will be sentenced to fifty Intermezzi—i.e., to attend fifty consecutive performances of the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" straight off the reel. If, per contra, his musical tastes are of a Philistinish order, he will be ordered to attend rehearsals of the scenes in which the Wanderer figures, or a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D or of Brahms's Fourth Symphony. Or, take yet another case. Suppose a musical critic to have committed manslaughter — we say "suppose," for of course musical critics are, ex hypothesi, incapable of any deeds of violence—in that case the requirements of justice would probably be adequately satisfied by condemning the culprit to a six months' course of musical soirées in private houses, at every one of which the Preislied should be sung by an amateur tenor. If the offender should chance to be a literary man, his punishment should be administered by a piano-organist or German band; if a decadent, he should be forced to hear nothing but Handel or early Verdi; if a purist, he should be condemned to listen to programmes exclusively composed of transcriptions and bedevilled versions of classical pieces—"hyphen music," as it might be called from the mode in which this posthumous collaboration is commonly expressed.

How easy it would be to make the punishment fit the crime, or, rather, the temperament of the criminal, is, we think, sufficiently illustrated in the foregoing paragraph. But a further and collateral advantage of the system yet remains to be indicated. We have no hesitation in saying that the establishment of such Musical Reformatories would go a long way towards solving that problem which at present occupies the serious attention of all who are interested in the future of the art—the over-production of executants. An extensive staff of performers would be necessary for the efficient carrying out of all sentences, and regular and remunerative employment would thus be found by the State for many artists who at present find the greatest difficulty in eking out a livelihood. What is more, there would be room for executants of every degree of skill and talent, the services of rudimentary amateurs being invaluable for the punishment of sensitively organised criminals of keen artistic tastes—the combination of an admirable judgment in the domain of æsthetics with an imperfect moral sense will be familiar to all students of the Renaissance period—while, on the other hand, the display of unbridled virtuosity is known to exert a peculiarly exasperating effect on persons of a coarse-fibred and Philistine nature. Then the system would lend itself excellently to the formation of honorific official designations, somewhat on the German pattern, such as State Ballad-singer to Holloway Gaol, or Principal Bassoonist at Broadmoor, or Chief Convict Contralto at Pentonville. Think, too, of the impetus which the adoption of this scheme would give to modern composers, especially composers of operatic and programme music, as soon as official and practical recognition was given to the penological aspect of music! Think of the brilliant success with which some modern writers would rise to the occasion if the Government were to offer a prize of £100 for the best symphonic poem designed to deter fraudulent trustees from a continuance in their nefarious practices, or for a quartet calculated to excite remorse in the bosom of hardened housebreakers. Think of the crop of moral one-act operas—what a change from the present type!—and hortatory ballads that would spring into existence under the new régime.

There remains, in conclusion, the interesting and important question whether the prisoners should be allowed themselves to take part in the musical performances designed for their correction or amelioration. One could imagine that in some cases it might have a very salutary effect, while in others no greater punishment could be devised than to oblige a criminal to practise five-finger exercises or to master the complicated fingering of the oboe or clarinet. The habit of cropping the hair of convicts, again, suggests itself as likely to require consideration in this context, from the well-defined ratio that is known to exist between the extent of an executant's virtuosity and the length of his hair. These, however, are matters of detail. For the present it is enough to have set forth in general terms the outlines of a scheme which, if duly carried out, can hardly fail to exert a profound influence on the well-being of the community.

FROM MY STUDY.

Last month this department of The Musical Times was taken up with a notice of Mrs. Louis Diehl's "Musical Memories." I now ask the reader's attention for a book of much the same class—Madame Mathilde Marchesi's "Marchesi and Music, Passages from the Life of a Famous Singing-Teacher." (Harper and Brothers.) This volume recommends itself at the outset as having been written for private perusal only. "The following reminiscences," says the authoress in her preface, "were, when first written, solely intended for my family, and not for publication. By the desire, however, of numerous friends and pupils who wish to peruse the story of my life—which for nearly fifty years has been uninterruptedly devoted to the art of singing—I now place them before the public." The book is shrewdly designed for the country which supplies its authoress with so many pupils, and to "the great American public" it is formally introduced by M. Massenet, who, however, urges that Madame Marchesi is "sufficiently important to introduce herself without anyone's assistance." In the following remarks I shall take very little notice of what may be called the business side of the book, especially as there is enough matter of a more interesting kind for the purpose of this article.

Madame Marchesi comes of an Alsatian family, through her paternal grandmother, but her father, Johann Graumann, was of German nationality, and a Frankfort merchant. The household was in flourishing circumstances, till, through some cause not stated, Graumann lost his entire fortune, the result being that Mathilde and an unmarried sister had to think of earning their own living. Passionately devoted to music, the future singing-mistress desired to adopt it as a profession, but the family, which had not lost its pride along with its pelf, would not hear of such a thing. It would be a discredit for a Graumann to become an artist; wherefore the family resolved to make her a governess. In pursuance of that design, Mathilde was sent to Vienna, where she had two aunts in influential positions, the hope being that these ladies would find a situation for their niece. One of the aunts was Baroness von Ertmann, Beethoven's friend, to whom he dedicated the Pianoforte Sonata, Opus 101. The Baroness shared her Frankfort relatives' objection to a musical career for the girl, and placed her in the family of a Count R. as governess, with a yearly salary of 100 florins and two singing lessons per week from a Viennese professor. But objections sometimes yield before persistent entreaty, and it was not very long before the young governess went back to her aunt's as a recognised musical student. Mathilde spent most of her time with the Baroness, who was an accomplished pianist and fond of talking about her illustrious master and friend, Beethoven. Here is one of her stories:

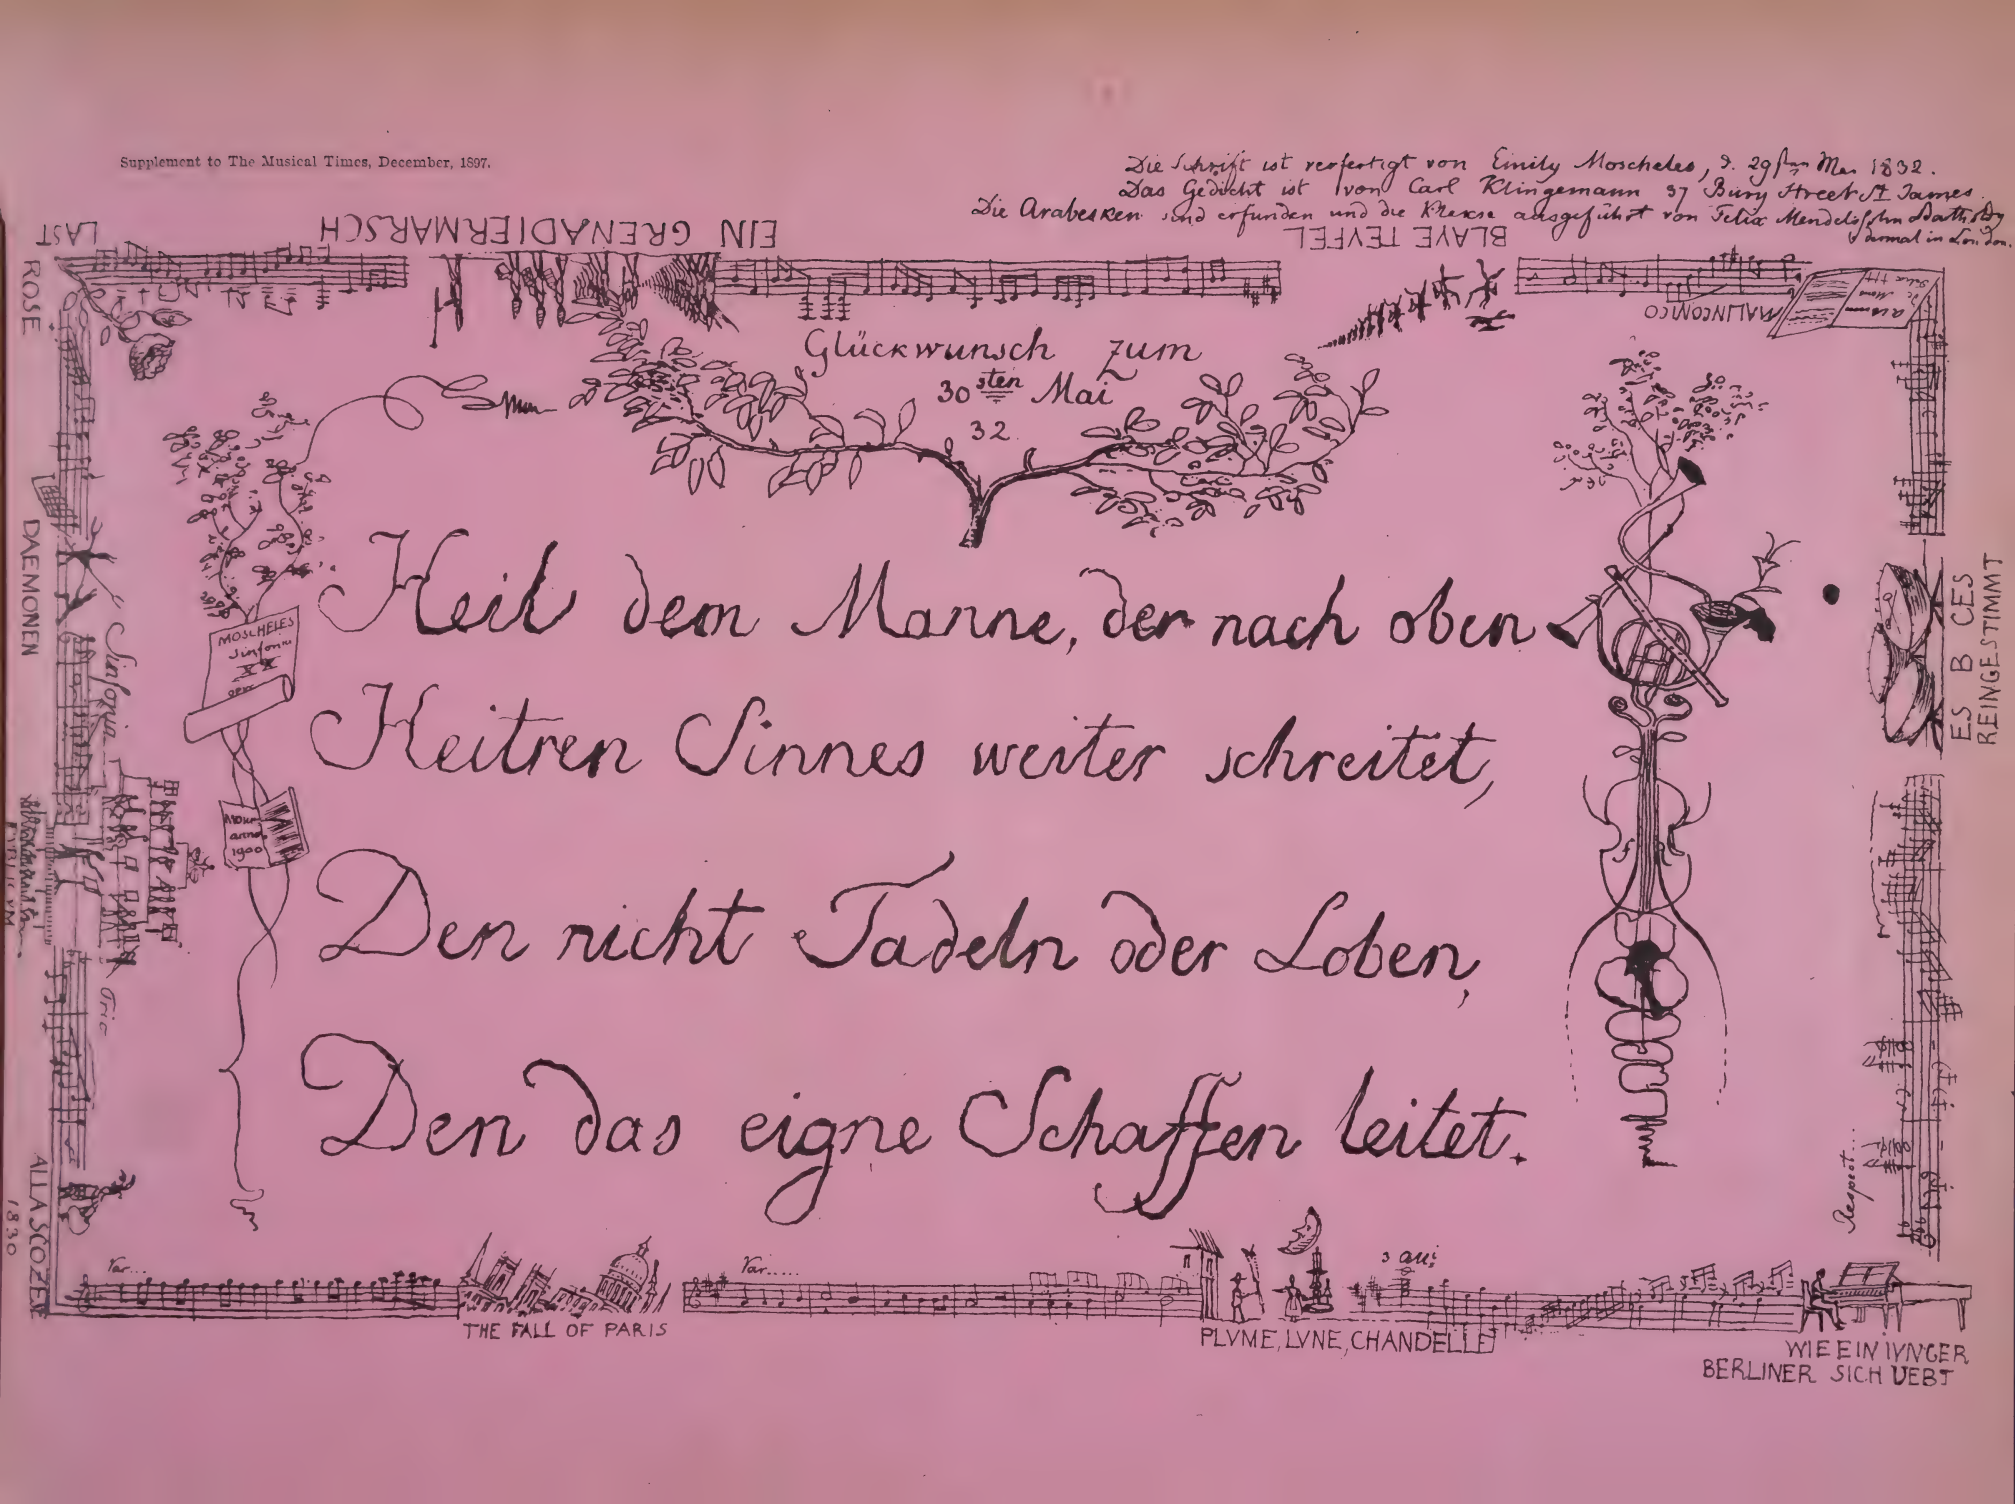
"Being anxious to hear his new sonatas, I went one day to Haslinger's music-shop, where I tried some of them on a grand piano. In my excitement I failed to notice a young man standing in a corner, but presently he came up to me, and you can imagine my astonishment when he suddenly seized my hand, and thanked me in the warmest terms for my interpretation of his sonatas. It was Beethoven. From that moment we became friends, and I should never forget the genuine interest that Beethoven bestowed on me and on all those connected with my family. It therefore appears strange that he did not come to see me when I lost my only child, only making his appearance after many weeks had elapsed. He then silently greeted me, sat down to the piano, and extemporised for a long time. That music sounded like a chorus of angels welcoming my child into the World of Light. Then he rose, pressed my hand, and left in silence, as he had come."

No conduct could have been more delicate and beautiful than this. The Baroness went on:

"Beethoven was a daily guest at our house. Often while lamenting a total loss of appetite he would suddenly remember having already had a good dinner, or he would forget, while feeling the keen pangs of hunger, that he had wandered about for many hours without having taken nourishment. He was very hot-tempered, very sensitive, and accordingly very unjust; he was suspicious of his best friends. But one could resent nothing in a man whose increasing deafness caused him such unhappiness. One had rather to take into account his physical and moral sufferings, and forgive everything. In this way we lived for many years in undisturbed friendship."



"Every day," adds Madame Marchesi, "the Baroness made me play one of Beethoven's sonatas, and when, sometimes, I held my hands too high, she forced them down with her arm, saying, 'This is how my great master wanted it done.' How different is the modern method of playing from the simple manner of bygone days!"

Mathilde Graumann was placed under Nicolai for singing, the composer of the "Merry Wives of Windsor" being considered the best master in Vienna. But she made little progress, and, one day, Madame Viardot said to her: "My dear child, you are not on the right road; you should go to Paris and study with my brother, Manuel Garcia." This alarmed the young girl, who obtained permission to return to Frankfort, in hope of ultimately making her way to Paris. But first she made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn, whose home life she describes as producing a deep impression upon her. "His wife, Cecile, daughter of the French Protestant clergyman, Jeanrenaud, of Frankfort, was as beautiful as the saint whose name she bore. Her dark, intelligent eyes reflected the pure nobility of her mind, and, although she spoke but little, when she did it was with deep feeling and much judgment."

Our authoress draws some pretty pictures of Mendelssohnian life, showing us the master giving his children their lessons, or taking part in the home music, or wandering with them into the country and making the organ in some village church speak as never before, then strolling into the woods, where "we would lie under the shade of old oak trees, and sing his vocal quartets, of which many were still in manuscript." "What a wonderful charm," adds Madame Marchesi, "lay in those pastoral concerts, and how child-like, how touchingly unaffected Mendelssohn was!" The master took great interest in his young friend, and procured for her an engagement at a Düsseldorf festival, where she made a first success. But he would not sanction the proposal to study in Paris. His wonted animosity against the French capital led him to urge that "no true and right feeling for art existed there, and that everything was sacrificed to effect." This did not impress Miss Graumann in the slightest degree. It was enough for her that Manuel Garcia lived in Paris, and, after a process of entreaty and coaxing, the parents sent her to him. Garcia, on testing her voice and skill, said she must begin all over again and work for several years. Alas! the poor girl had only money enough for six months, but, as she now tells us, she put her trust in God, and began study the very next day. She remained with Garcia two years, and was then ordered by her parents to seek an engagement in Milan. Miss Graumann obeyed, and was soon in the thick of revolutionary troubles. With some difficulty she made her way back to Paris, and, in the season of 1849, came to England.

It is not my purpose to follow the events of our authoress's busy artistic life, and I shall note only those parts of her book in which persons of musical eminence are mentioned.

Liszt.—Miss Graumann visited the great pianist at Weimar, and writes àpropos : "How can I accurately describe the blind worship of the elder Princess (Wittgenstein) for M. Liszt. She generally sat at his feet, kissed his hands, and hung, so to speak, on his very lips. Liszt appeared quite accustomed to receive her homage, accepting it all with lordly indifference. In his absence I often spent hours in conversation with this highly intelligent and amiable lady, who used to be stretched full length upon her sofa, incessantly smoking strong cigars, and usually divesting herself of her silk stockings and black satin soleless shoes, a proceeding which displayed elegant, snow-white feet, in the beauty of which she seemed to take great pride." This very unconventional person and Liszt quarrelled one day, and their young visitor was the cause. On Liszt offering to escort Miss Graumann to a rehearsal, the Princess cried in commanding tones, "You will please stay here with me." Then the dispute began, and Liszt came out of it victorious. Incidentally it appears that Liszt admired Rossini. When Miss Graumann proposed to abridge one of the Italian master's airs, he said, "Rossini's music is too beautiful to permit of any omission."

Chorley.—Mendelssohn's "The Son and Stranger" was first performed in England at a soirée given by Miss Graumann. This was in 1851. The performers used Chorley's translation of the text, which the critic of the Athenæum himself read, the accompaniments were played by Benedict and Lindsay Sloper, and the characters were sung by Mrs. Enderson, Miss Graumann, Mr. Marchesi (who was soon to marry his hostess), Mr. Lockey, and Manuel Garcia, who took the part which is given in monotone.

Formes. — Madame Marchesi gives an amusing description of a touring company to which the German basso belonged. They must have been a happy family: "Our company was composed of the most heterogeneous elements. Fräulein Angri, possessor of a rare contralto voice, never sang during the day, but was constantly knitting; Herr Formes, whose ways were somewhat rough, would from time to time emit inarticulate sounds, in order to try his voice, as he put it, and Ernst, who was very delicate, would generally lie in bed until the beginning of the concert. While travelling we usually occupied different carriages, as there existed very little sympathy for one another between the various members of the company."

Meyerbeer.—"We found Meyerbeer particularly amiable and obliging, and saw no trace of the reticent, repelling manner so many complained of."

Moscheles.—The following is part of a letter addressed to Madame Marchesi by Moscheles: "We are trying to acclimatise Wagner's music here (Leipzig), and 'Tannhäuser' has already been played for some months; but it is an open question whether any other nation than the German will have the patience and the perseverance to sing such music and listen to it."

Rossini.—The atmosphere of Rossini's home during his residence in Florence was not cheerful. "There was never any music, nor was it even mentioned. The prevailing tone in the salon of the hostess was stiff and formal in the extreme, and all who frequented it suffered from its depressing influence. Madame Rossini, a capricious and unamiable woman, troubled herself very little about her guests, and devoted her whole attention to a sick dog, which lay on an elegant cushion at her feet." Still, Rossini, so silent in his own house, was talkative and lively when he came to see us." It is generally so with a hen-pecked husband.

Wagner.—"This great man visited us in Vienna, when I had a long discussion with him on matters relating to singing, but there was one point on which we did not agree. He was of opinion that every voice should be at the composer's command. I, on the contrary, held that the composer must take into consideration the compass of the different voices by which interpretation, pronunciation, and declamation must naturally benefit. Wagner remained true to his principle, and so, alas! many voices have been ruined through his music, and many talented singers, both male and female, have been lost to art." Apropos to ruined voices, Rossini once said to Madame Marchesi, "Cette musique de barricades, qui chante toujours à l'assaut, est certes la ruine des voix les plus puissantes."

Hiller. — "In his judgment of other musicians Hiller was always particularly charitable, but he was very bitter against Liszt, with whom, at one time, he had been on intimate terms, for he had quarrelled with him over Wagner, for whom he had no sympathy."

Verdi.—An anecdote of the great Italian master when in Vienna at the production of his "Nabucco." "On the night of the first performance, as Verdi was leaving the theatre and preparing to enter his carriage, he was suddenly surrounded by a crowd of students, who cheered him enthusiastically. Being of a retiring disposition, and always having a horror of stormy ovations, he jumped quickly into the carriage, but when he observed that the hot-headed youths intended unhitching the horses, he sprang out at the opposite door and ran like lightning to the hotel, never leaving the theatre on the following nights until he was sure that no one was lying in wait for him."

Much more of personal interest might be extracted from Madame Marchesi's book, but I have reached the limit of available space, and enough has been done to show that the volume deserves a corner in musical libraries. X.

"HARK! THE HERALD ANGELS SING."

Charles Wesley's Christmas hymn, "Hark! the herald angels sing," has become so closely associated with Mendelssohn's music that it may be interesting to refer to it, especially in the light of some fresh information. The tune is that of No. 2 ("The Lied") of Mendelssohn's "Festgesang," for male voices and brass instruments, and was sung in the open air at Leipzig, June 24, 1840, in celebration of the Gutenburg Festival, for which the work was composed. Mendelssohn afterwards arranged it for mixed voices at the request of his English publisher. The adaptation to Charles Wesley's words was made more than forty years ago by Mr. William H. Cummings, then the obscure young organist of Waltham Abbey, but now the Principal of the Guildhall School of Music. Mr. Cummings informs us that he eagerly procured everything that Mendelssohn composed as soon as it was published. While playing over the chorus in G he was at once struck by its adaptability to the words "Hark! the herald angels sing." He copied out the parts, and the tune was sung with great enthusiasm by the congregation at Waltham Abbey. He soon afterwards began to receive so many applications for manuscript copies that he took his arrangement to Messrs. Ewer and Co., who published it in 1856. Its earliest appearance in a hymnal was, we believe, in "Hymns Ancient and Modern" (1861), where, as Mr. Cummings justly says, an unwarrantable alteration has been made in the melody by the introduction of a B at the third beat of bar twelve which Mendelssohn did not write. Editors of subsequent hymnals, trusting to the infallibility of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," have not only copied this mistake, but, like the musical editor of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," have neglected to make any mention of Mr. Cummings's name as the arranger of this popular Christmas hymn.

But we happen to have in our possession a letter of Mendelssohn's, hitherto unpublished, written to his English publisher, Mr. E. Buxton, the former proprietor of Ewer and Co., on this subject, an extract from which we think will be read with interest. The letter, dated "Leipzig: 30 April, 1843," and in Mendelssohn's own English, is on the subject of a translation, by Mr. Bartholomew, of the "Festgesang":—

> . . . Then I must repeat the wish I already expressed in my letter to Mr. Bartholomew. I think there ought to be other words [than those written by Bartholomew] to No. 2, the "Lied." If the right ones are hit at, I am sure that piece will be liked very much by the singers and the hearers, but it will never do to sacred words. There must be a national and merry subject found out, something to which the soldierlike and buxom motion of the piece has some relation, and the words must express something gay and popular, as the music tries to do it.

Mendelssohn's use of the terms "national and merry subject" and "soldierlike and buxom motion" is interesting in connection with the present associations of the tune. In justice to Mr. Cummings, however, it must be said that he had no idea of Mendelssohn's views on the matter; and, with all due respect to the composer's opinion that it would "never do to sacred words," everyone must admit that the adaptation is an exceedingly happy and appropriate one.

A close-connecting link with Mendelssohn has been severed by the death of his elder daughter and second child, Mrs. Marie Benecke, which, we much regret to record, took place after a few hours' illness at her residence, Norfolk Lodge, Barnet, on October 28. Mrs. Benecke was born at Leipzig, October 2, 1839, and although she was only eight years old when her distinguished father died, she retained a vivid recollection of his sunny home-life. There is a characteristic reference to her in his letter of January 29, 1845, written when she was only five years old, in which he says: "Marie is learning the scale of C, and even that I have actually forgotten to play, for I have taught her to pass her thumb under the wrong finger!" Since 1860, the year of her marriage to Mr. Charles Victor Benecke, Mendelssohn's daughter has been resident in England, and the reputation of her father in the country he loved so dearly was very precious to her. She took the greatest interest in all that appertained to him, and was always ready to give information in regard to his life and works. In this connection we may mention that she was the channel through which the business arrangements were made by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., when they published Mendelssohn's Eighth book of the "Songs without Words," the "Reformation" Symphony, the "Cornelius" March, and other posthumous works. Her interesting collection of mementoes of her father, especially his clever drawings of English and Scotch scenes, she reverently treasured. Two years ago Mrs. Benecke was sorely stricken by the terribly sad loss of her younger son, Edward Felix Mendelssohn Benecke, a distinguished Oxford scholar of the greatest promise, who mysteriously disappeared on the Alps, and whose body has never been recovered. The shadow of this calamity darkened her naturally smiling face, and, although ever cheerful and resigned, only death could give her that "perfect peace" which she failed to experience while here on earth. The remains of Mrs. Benecke were laid to rest, in brilliant sunshine, in the village churchyard of South Mimms, near St. Albans, on the 2nd ult., two days before the fiftieth anniversary of her father's death. The funeral was of a private nature, the family circle including Mrs. Wach, of Leipzig, Mendelssohn's younger daughter and now only surviving child. Amongst the personal friends present were Sir George Grove, Mr. Gerald Callcott Horsley, and Mr. F. G. Edwards, the last-named also representing Messrs. Novello and Co. Mrs. Benecke's surviving children are Mr. Paul Victor Mendelssohn Benecke, Fellow and Tutor of Magdalen College, Oxford, and the Misses Else and Margaret Benecke.

It is not our intention to discuss the pros and cons of the recent libel case, Fry v. Runciman, and certainly we shall say nothing impugning the verdict and judgment. We prefer to gather from the whole matter such lessons as it affords; especially to point out its bearing upon a certain practice of criticism (?) originally imported from the United States, where the spice of journalism is personalities. It is encouraging to know that within the last few years musical criticism has made diminishing use of uncomplimentary references to individuals where such references are extraneous to the real question at issue. But personalities in journalism are not dead yet. Indeed, it is more than ever plain that we still have amongst us some distinguished professors of the art. With them it would probably be vain to reason. They have chosen their line of operations, either because it gratifies their nature or offers what they conceive to be the shortest and easiest way of getting themselves talked about and their journals read. As they have begun, so, no doubt, they will continue, always, however, more or less under the tempering influences of legal process. Writing for others, we may well ask what of value can be gained by importing personal vilification into the treatment of artistic questions. Abuse proves nothing, unless it be the vulgarity of the abuser; it does not advance an argument, any more than the free employment of a certain emphatic adjective adds to the lucidity of a costermonger; it shocks and disgusts all persons of clean minds, and it wins the applause only of the grown-up boys who used to spin cockchafers and now love to see their own human kind transfixed. In the name of music, which is generally regarded as a refining art, and in the name of the dignity and self-respect which become all those who profess to instruct their fellows, we beg young journalists never to indulge in offensive personalities. That way is the broad road that leads to professional destruction, for it alienates the wise and good and pleases only those who cannot be so described. And may not the public be asked to discourage a senseless practice by refusing in any way to patronise it? For their own protection they should do this. The man who touches filth is necessarily defiled.

The grievous bereavement that has befallen Verdi sets one thinking on the matrimonial ventures of great composers. Verdi was singularly happy in his choice on both occasions, though he is believed never to have quite recovered from the sudden loss of his first wife and both his children. His subsequent union with Giuseppina Strepponi, the famous prima donna, who shared the triumphs of the young author of "Nabucco" in March, 1842, was childless, but in all other respects of unclouded happiness. It would be interesting to go into the question how far the great composers were helped by their wives. Ideal unions, like that of Robert and Clara Schumann, are, we fear, the exception rather than the rule; though Weber's wife was a woman of talent as well as a devoted helpmeet, and Mendelssohn's married life was singularly happy. Berlioz cast in his lot with a gifted artist, and, to quote his own words, "we lacerated each other." The greatest genius is, we fear, seldom compatible with domestic happiness, for Bach's case was probably exceptional, and neither Mozart nor Haydn can be pronounced altogether fortunate in their choice. Lastly, it is of no ordinary significance that four such masters as Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, and Brahms should all have been bachelors.

What constitutes a cheerful, or, as the old composers called it, a "chearful" glee? This question is suggested by the death of Mr. A. J. Caldicott (referred to in another column), the composer of the glee "Humpty Dumpty," which gained a special prize in a somewhat remarkable manner. Twenty years ago the Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Club offered two prizes of £20 each for the best serious and cheerful glees. No less than 114 compositions were sent in by eighty composers, of which sixty were cheerful and fifty-four serious (we mean the glees and not necessarily the composers, who were doubtless all serious in their intentions). After due consideration the judges awarded the prizes to Mr. Henry Lahee for his setting of "Hence, loathed Melancholy" ("cheerful"), and to Dr. Henry Hiles for "Hush'd in Death" ("serious," naturally). But before deciding upon the prize-winner of the best cheerful glee, the adjudicators gave their award to another glee called "Humpty Dumpty," as being the best musical composition; but they left it to the committee to decide whether they (the committee) could accept it as a glee. The committee, perhaps largely composed of serious men, decided that "Humpty Dumpty" hardly met their requirements as a glee, but was more of the nature of a musical joke! Their decision was duly communicated to Mr. Caldicott, whose expectations must have "had a great fall," though he did not re-compose nor "put Humpty Dumpty together again." Notwithstanding this "fall," the "musical joke" was duly performed by the Manchester gleemen, and, nothing daunted, Mr. Caldicott conducted his "Humpty Dumpty" in person. Although encores were not allowed, the composition met with such unanimous approval that the composer was obliged to accede to the loud demands for a repetition. The chairman then announced, amidst the vociferous applause of "Humpty Dumpty's" admirers, that the committee had unanimously decided to give a special prize to Mr. Caldicott. Who will say that he did not deserve the fruit, if not the wall-fruit, of his labours?

Dr. Edvard Grieg, who is now on a visit to our shores, has contributed a thoughtful and significant article to the Century Magazine for November on "Mozart." The utterances of a distinguished musician on one of the most divinely gifted masters of music always commands attention and respect, and therefore we have great satisfaction in giving a few extracts from Dr. Grieg's admirable paper:

To speak of Mozart is like speaking of a god. When Gretchen asks Faust: "Do you believe in God?" he answers, "Who dares name Him, who confess Him?" In these profound words of Goethe I would express my feelings toward Mozart. Where he is greatest he embraces all times. What if this or that generation be sufficiently blasé to desire to overlook him? Beauty is eternal, and the edicts of fashion can obscure it only for a moment. As far as our day is concerned, it is well that Wagner has engraved Mozart's name on his shield. His belief in Mozart is unmistakably attested in his writings, and he has thereby placed himself in emphatic opposition to the musicians of our time, who are so advanced that they care no longer to hear Mozart's music, and reluctantly grant it a place in their concert programmes. It is to be hoped that this arrogant ignorance has not found a root in the healthy musical youth of the free West [the article appears in an American magazine], and I therefore speak to my honoured readers under the presumption of their sympathy with the unapproachable master. In using the word "unapproachable," I may possibly hurt the feelings of some. For what shall we say, then, of Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner? In a certain sense Mozart is, even compared with these heroes, unapproachable. In Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner we admire principally the depth and energy of the human mind; in Mozart, the divine instinct. His highest inspirations seem untouched by human labour. Unlike the masters cited, no trace of struggle remains in the forms in which he moulded his material. Mozart has the childish, happy, Aladdin nature which overcomes all difficulties as in play. He creates like a god, without pain.

Later on in the article Dr. Grieg utters some weighty words on what we may call the depreciation of Mozart, introducing an interesting piece of autobiography:

But, you may ask, whence comes this lack of reverence for Mozart in so many talented young musicians? Here is the heart of the matter. Many of us have in our early youth loved—nay, worshipped—Mozart, but afterward we ate of the modern fruit of knowledge, an indulgence which, like that in the Garden of Eden, drove us from our paradise. Some of us, luckily, avoided a complete surfeit, and found the way back. I frankly confess that I too suffered this change: I loved Mozart, then for a time lost him, but found him again, never more to lose him. A modern musician can easily find the cause of these changes in the attitude of young people toward drawing and colour. We begin our artistic schooling by learning the lines. Our teachers exhibit to us the great masters of the past, who are unexcelled in this matter. We study them and learn to love and imitate them. Modern art is still unknown to us, and is, indeed, kept from us as much as possible. But when we gain our first peep, behold! the vivid, brilliant, colours to which our time has given the place of honour appeal temptingly from every canvas. We are intoxicated, completely enthralled, forget former ideals, and deliver ourselves over unconditionally to the seductions of sense-enchanting colours. This is what happened to the last generation, and the newest of the new composers more than ever find their joy in drowning themselves in the colour-sea, in which no ideas or forms or lines can save them any more, or prevent them from sinking deeper and deeper. "Colour, colour, and again colour," seems to be their motto. It is true that with great search one may still recognise some lines, but sadly out of drawing, as a rule. But there are signs of an impending change. A small minority already feels the craving for pure lines so strongly that we may hope before long to see it lead to some result. I do not mean that the art that is to come will, like a Rinaldo, shrink from colour as from a seductive siren who, at the sound of the plain, chaste melody of the knights of the cross, loses all her charms. No; this new art will, first of all, preach the gospel of the true joy in life, will unite lines and colours in marriage, and show that it has its roots in all the past, that it draws sustenance from old as well as from new masters.

To see ourselves as others see us is, with all due respect to Robert Burns, not always a very pleasant occupation, though as a stimulating agent properly applied no one will deny its potency. But there is much satisfaction when the inspection by others gives cause for some self-congratulation, such, for instance, as the report of Count Franchi Verney to the Italian Education Department on musical education in France and England. The following extracts from that report, relating to our own land, tell their own tale, and therefore comment upon them would be superfluous:

It might almost be said that music is a vital and indispensable element of English life. And this not merely in "the season," when social existence is characterised by an almost marvellous degree of animation, but at all periods of the year and notably during the winter, when the inclemency of the weather makes the delights of home all the more appreciable. Public and private assemblies, meetings for the purpose of improvement or amusement, important performances of oratorios and symphonies, popular concerts on Saturdays and Mondays and even on Sundays, too, in spite of Anglo-Saxon puritanism, recitals by soloists; in short, musical exhibitions of all kinds—except opera, which during this cold season occupies a less prominent place—follow one another with feverish energy and inexorable regularity. This musical activity is collective rather than individual, reflex rather than direct, a matter of normal routine rather than of impulse or enthusiasm, and for this reason it is perhaps lacking in any great originality or special geniality of expression or inspiration. But in spite of this there can be no doubt that the substratum of the country is essentially a musical one, that the artist is there appreciated at the true value of his initiative and activity, and that from year to year every man is convinced of the utility of a serious musical education, and personally feels the need of it. But there is more than this. A musical education is regarded as a matter of order, progress, and due proportion.

The Count having visited the schools in the North of England, at Manchester, Preston, and elsewhere, gives the following testimony to the intelligent work of the numerous choral societies which are such an excellent feature of our musical life in city, town, and hamlet. Here are his words:

And I specially noticed that the numerous musical societies earnestly strive to attain the same pitch of perfect regularity, constant diligence, and minute and continuous exactitude in the fulfilment of their engagements. Their members scrupulously observe the regulations to which they have once signified their adhesion, thus forming a vast network which unites small and large centres alike. Thus it comes about that on all sides one finds ready to one's hand a contingent of able and intelligent instrumentalists and choirs, capable of reading music at sight and of rendering the most ambitious oratorios and the most intricate symphonies after a single practice. And each contingent of executants has its large and cultivated local public which is able to distinguish the first-rate artist from the mediocre, and which fully appreciates the special characteristics of each. This public is not easily roused to enthusiasm, but forms its judgments calmly and serenely, listening in religious silence and with the utmost respect to the various manifestations of the art, and often following, score in hand, the intricacies of the most classical compositions.

Those who would like to become familiar with other features of this most interesting report will find them in the School Music Review for November.

Mr. Cuthbert Hadden, of Edinburgh, has completed, and Mr. Nimmo will shortly publish, a "Life" of George Thomson, the friend of Burns. "His (Thomson's) place in musical history," says the late Mr. A. W. Thayer, "is that of the most enthusiastic, persevering and successful collector of the melodies of Scotland, Wales and Ireland, a work begun in his youth and continued for forty years or more." Having collected the melodies, Thomson hit upon the bold and original idea of asking eminent composers to write new symphonies and accompaniments to them, with parts ad libitum for violin, or flute, and violoncello. Haydn wrote a very large number and Beethoven contributed no less than sixty-five, which, we fear, are now almost forgotten. We understand that Mr. Cuthbert Hadden has dealt very fully with Thomson's "correspondence about the music," he having devoted upwards of sixty pages of his book to this section, of which thirty-seven pages are allotted to Beethoven and his correspondence with the Edinburgh enthusiast. George Thomson, who died in 1851, in his ninety-fourth year, has other claims to musical interest; and he also forms a kind of link between Scotland's great poet and England's great novelist. Thomson's daughter married George Hogarth, for fourteen years secretary of the Philharmonic Society, the first musical critic of the Daily News, and the author of one or two musical books. Hogarth's daughter, Catherine (Thomson's granddaughter), married Charles Dickens, and the early death of another daughter, Mary Hogarth, was a terrible blow to the author of "Pickwick." Thomson and his wife are buried at Kensal Green Cemetery—a Campo Santo of extraordinary interest—in a grave adjoining that containing the remains of Mary Hogarth and her father and mother. Mr. Hadden's book should be anticipated with eager interest, not only by his fellow countrymen in the "land o' cakes," but by dwellers on this side of the Tweed.

Referring to the late Mr. Tallis Trimnell, whose death we recorded in our October issue, page 696, the Oamaru Mail says:—

It will be generally conceded that the musical world of New Zealand has lost its most illustrious figure. Modest to a degree very unusual with those who are devotees of the art, Mr. Trimnell had earned distinction long before he came to this colony, alike as an organist, composer of church music, instructor of brass bands, and adjudicator of band contests, in which latter capacity he had been associated with Lieutenant Charles Godfrey and other eminent musicians at many of the most notable contests in England, his experience in that direction dating back to the early sixties. Mr. Trimnell was also held in high estimation as a musician at home.

The movement, initiated at a meeting held at Wellington, to erect a memoral to the lamented musician has met with so much success that between sixty and seventy pounds were subscribed at once in the room. A committee was appointed, with power to add to its number from all parts of New Zealand, as it is very properly considered that the memorial to the late Mr. Trimnell should be of a colonial, and not merely of a parochial, character.

No: it is not the poor perennially persecuted provincial printer this time. It is either the Court Newsman or a London compositor who is responsible for the following typographical eccentricities which appeared under the heading of "The Court, Balmoral," in a great London "daily" of October 22:

Mdlle. Pancera had the honour of playing the following selections on the pianoforte before the Queen and the Royal Family:

Fantasia C. dur I Satz	Schumann.

The solution (or digestion) of the above specimen of printer's "pie" may furnish some amusement to our readers during the approaching festive season.

It is very gratifying to record the fruition resulting from the seeds of a musical scholarship. The new organist of St. John's College, Cambridge, in succession to the late Dr. Garrett, is Dr. E. T. Sweeting, who was formerly Novello Scholar at the National Training School of Music. For fifteen years Dr. Sweeting has been music-master at Rossall School, and while working there he successively took the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Music at Oxford. The St. John's organist may safely be trusted to uphold the best traditions of the place and of his distinguished predecessor. We wish him all success.

Amongst the names of those who recently took the degree of Bachelor of Music at the University of Oxford is that of the editor of our contemporary, Musical News, Mr. John E. Borland, to whom we offer our hearty congratulations.

The Incorporated Society of Musicians will hold its thirteenth annual conference at the Hôtel Cecil, from January 4 to 7 inclusive. This will be the third meeting of the kind in London. The Lord Mayor has kindly consented to open the proceedings at the Mansion House, after which Sir John Stainer will take the chair and deliver an address on matters connected with the musical profession. The remaining meetings, to be held at the Hôtel Cecil, will be presided over by Dr. Swinnerton Heap (Birmingham) and Dr. Henry Hiles (Manchester). In addition to the annual meeting of the Society, two musical evenings, and the inevitable dinner, the following papers will be read: "The Feis Ceoil," by Mr. Joseph Seymour (Dublin); "The Tonic Basis of all Music," by Dr. F. J. Sawyer (Brighton); and "Bach's Forty-eight Fugues," by Dr. Frederic Iliffe (Oxford). A feature of special interest in connection with the conference will be the performance, on Wednesday evening, the 5th prox., of Tallis's Motet in forty parts, which will be sung by a choir of 200 voices, mostly members of the Society, under the direction of Dr. A. H. Mann, of Cambridge. One of the singers will be the veteran Dr. E. J. Hopkins, who sang his tenor part in the same work sixty-two years ago!

We believe that one of the largest English colonies in Germany is to be found in Düsseldorf, the charming Gartenstadt—as Düsseldorfers like to call it—on the Rhine. It is therefore but right that performances of British music should take place there more frequently than in other less "favoured" towns of the Fatherland. We have on many previous occasions referred to performances of English orchestral works by the various excellent orchestras that provide for the musical needs of the art-loving Düsseldorfer, but we do not remember hearing of the production of a piece of chamber music. On the 16th ult., however, Herren Julius Buths, Otto Reibold, Hugo Köhler, and Gustav Hartleb played Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie's fine Pianoforte Quartet in E flat at their first "Kammermusik-Matinée," and achieved a distinct success therewith, as the local press is ready to admit. The Matinée took place on Sunday forenoon, at 11.30!

Overheard after the last Philharmonic concert, when the "Jupiter" Symphony was performed:

"Thank God for Mozart."

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

The sovereign people of the State of Mississipi take upon themselves sometimes to bestow musical honours other than those appropriate to the "toast of the evening." From a report on the work of Mr. J. H. Hall, printed in the Raleigh Reformer, I take the following:

The Doctor for many years bore the title of Professor of Music, but a day or two since, there being a number of scientific and literary teachers present at the Normal, acting in concert with the musical teachers in attendance, by a rising and unanimous vote conferred upon him the title of Doctor of Music. This title has been worthily earned by years of honest labour in his chosen field, and no doubt but that it will be worthily worn.

Mus. Doc by popular vote is a cheap and efficacious method likely to spread. "Vox populi, vox Dei." Mr. Southgate must be on the alert.

We can all rejoice with Mr. Stockley, late chorus-master to the Birmingham Festivals, in the handsome recognition of his services which has just been made.

In sending him a cheque for £500, the result of a subscription, Mr. Beale, chairman of the orchestral committee (now Lord Mayor) spoke of the unwillingness of Mr. Stockley's friends that he should retire from a leading position in the musical world without some token of regard. In reply, Mr. Stockley expressed his feeling that the testimonial and many other kindnesses were intended to show that in the opinion of his fellow-citizens he had not laboured in vain for forty-two years. By all this the pain of severing long-abiding bonds was happily tempered, and all parties are to be congratulated.

Organ recitals are given in St. Sepulchre's Church, on Tuesdays, at 1.10 p.m., and among the names of recent performers I note those of Mr. Edwin Barnes and Mr. Churchill Sibley. A vocalist takes part on each occasion. It is a most happy idea to throw open the church and provide good music during the City luncheon hour.

I have received a letter from Mr. Edward Lawrance, of Merthyr Tydfil, calling my attention to the merits of an English musician, Mr. Percy Sherwood, now resident in Dresden. My correspondent's idea is to make this stray lamb of the English fold better known at home. He writes: "If some publisher could be induced to look at, and bring out some of his works, or he could be invited to play at Queen's Hall, at the Crystal Palace, or elsewhere, it would, I venture to say, bring honour to his helpers." Mr. Percy Sherwood's best course is to come to London with his works. That done, influential persons will be able to form an independent judgment. Meanwhile it may be taken as beyond dispute that there is every disposition to recognise and assist real talent.

It cannot for a moment be supposed that even the humblest and least informed musical critic would talk about Beethoven's "Sonata Appopionata." Yet a work so named is discussed in the Western Daily Mercury of the 17th ult. Obviously the boy has gone West to amuse himself. He amuses others who read, as a result of his enterprise, some remarks attributed to a musical critic: "Times without number have we heard Beethoven's 'Sonata Appopionata' played by all sexes and conditions of pianists." "All sexes" is as good as "Sonata Appopionata."

Among those who sent telegrams of condolence to Verdi on the death of his wife were the King of Italy and four of his ministers, Signor Crispi (late Prime Minister), the municipalities of Rome, Milan, Genoa, Florence, and Turin; the Prefects of Parma, Piacenza, and Fiorenzuola; four of the great composer's brother senators, the Conservatoires of Milan and Naples, the Academy of St. Cecilia, Rome; the composers Mascagni, Puccini, Mascheroni, and Tosti; M. Sardou, M. du Locle, the directors of the Opéra, Paris; and very many musical societies in and out of Italy.

Sarasate has given all the presents he has received during his career to his native city, Pampeluna, and the Municipal Council has placed them in a Museum called by the name of the donor. Among the gifts are three rings from the Emperor William I., a clock from Napoleon III., a ring with a large diamond from the Emperor of Brazil, a collection of valuable canes from the Queen Regent of Spain, &c. The value of the collection is estimated at over 100,000 francs.

Carl Goldmark recently celebrated, at his country house near Gmunden, the fiftieth year of his professional life. He is described as in excellent health, but devoted to a life of quiet and retirement. At present he is writing an opera for the Imperial Theatre, Vienna.

There is a new broom (director) at the Popular Theatre, Budapest, and, as usual, it sweeps clean. Observing that the artists were in the habit of coming down to the footlights, so as to be near the prompter, and there addressing their remarks to the audience instead of to each other, the director has abolished the prompter. The musical artists attached to the theatre are protesting.

Mr. Henry T. Finck is on the war-path with a view to the scalp of Mr. Krehbiel. Reviewing a book which made fun of critics who failed to appreciate Verdi till he became famous, Mr. Krehbiel said: "There is nothing sillier than a performance like this," adding that it is a "favourite amusement of some of the champions of Wagner, Mr. Finck, for instance." This brought up Mr. Finck, who proceeded to remind Mr. Krehbiel that he himself might have been put in the pillory of the Finckian "Life of Wagner." "Some of the things he (Krehbiel) wrote about Wagner earlier in his career would, if printed in parallel columns, make very funny reading." Gentlemen, gentlemen, what is the good of all this?

Joseph Bennett.

CHURCH MUSIC.

There are signs of a continual enlargement of the scope of music in Church. One natural result of bringing the oratorio to its original home, the Church, was the increased employment of the Church orchestra. There is also an immense amount of ritual and service music calling for orchestral accompaniments as well as the presence of the more passive sounds of the organ. A notable creation upon ecclesiastical lines in this direction has been the formation of the "Church Orchestral Society." Another association is the "Catholic Orchestral Society." The latter has the advantage of dealing with the largest and most varied library of ecclesiastical music set with orchestral accompaniments the religious world possesses.

Then the restoration of the oratorio to the Church and the increased employment of orchestral accompaniments have accentuated another development, the external enlargement of Church choirs, by the additional aid of local choral societies, in view of securing a necessarily increased choral force.

It has been thought that in these days of general musical education, congregational practices of music intended primarily for congregational use might be advanced to the formation of parochial choral societies; a result possibly of as much value to the Church in one direction as the establishment of parochial councils may be in another way. So, as history continues to repeat itself, we may, greatly to our gain, once more fully recognise the existence of the ritual or chancel choir and the musical or nave choir, with the modern advantage of employing both bodies in combination in the larger and more imposing forms of sacred music.

At St. Mary Magdalene, Enfield, a choral festival was held on the 3rd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. T. Roylands Smith, the able Exeter Diocesan choirmaster, at which some 200 clergy, singers, and players on instruments assisted, with Mr. C. T. Davis as the organist. Such a gathering seems to suggest that no possible choral and instrumental developments connected with Church music need be regarded as visionary. Dr. Varley Roberts's Evening Service in C and Professor Prout's anthem "Behold, my servant," were effectively rendered upon this occasion.

Some five-and-twenty years ago it was observed: "the Cathedral system is on its trial." Since then our Cathedrals have been gradually regaining the position they held ages ago as centres of public worship, and they are now becoming in addition the places in which are to be realised the most complete and imposing presentations of sacred music.

The great annual Service held at St. Paul's as this year, on the 18th ult., the twenty-fourth anniversary of the London Church Choir Association, is one of the many evidences of the splendid work now being carried forward in our national Cathedral. The united choirs upon this occasion formed a chorus of some twelve hundred voices. Sir George Martin directed the music with unfailing tact and quiet firmness. The principal pieces were Sir George Martin's own Jubilee "Te Deum" and Sir John Stainer's anthem "Lord, Thou art God." A full report of the Service is given in another column.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Exigencies of space forbid the insertion of organ recital programmes in these columns at full length; but in the interests of artistic progress, features of such schemes, displaying novelty and illustrating artistic activity, will receive attention.

The list of pieces played by Mr. T. B. Rutherford, of North Berwick, at a recital given at Bournemouth, included Vorspiel ("Parsifal"), Wagner, and an Elegy and Adagio by Flavel. In the course of two recitals given by Mr. Leonard Heneker, at St. George's Church, Wrotham, Kent, on the 5th ult., the schemes included Pastorale ("L'Angelus"), W. W. Starmer; Böellmann's "Gothic" Suite, a work of real interest, consisting of Introduction, Minuet, "Ave Maria," and Toccata; Andante and Allegro, Bache, a gifted composer and useful teacher, whose early departure was a loss to the art; and English standard works by Smart and Calkin. Mr. J. Preston's programmes for the 8th ult., at the Union Congregational Church, Sunderland, included a Pastoral Interlude by H. W. Parker, Hatton's excellent Toccata in F sharp minor, the fine Fantasia written by E. Silas for the organ opening at Blenheim Palace, and Salomé's Offertoire in D flat. Mr. A. H. Allen gave recitals at St. David's, Denbigh, on the 11th ult., including an interesting piece entitled "On a bass" (Sir John Stainer), from the recently published "Six Pieces for Organ," and the too-little played Andante in G major (S. S. Wesley) and Fantasia in C (B. Tours). Mr. E. Barnes played at St. Sepulchre's Church, Holborn, on the 16th ult., a programme including Gade's Moderato, Allegretto, and Allegro. Mr. Silver's recital scheme at St. Martin's, Caerphilly, recently given, included typical specimens of the organ music of Smart and S. S. Wesley. Mailly's "Marche Solennelle" and one of Smart's charming Andantes were played by Dr. G. H. Smith, at Sculcoates Parish Church, at a recent recital.

At Ayr Old Church, Dr. D. F. Wilson and Mr. J. Edgar recently gave organ and violin recitals illustrating "the great schools of music." The composers of German organ music included Bach, Mendelssohn, and Rheinberger. But why not Merkel's beautiful Adagio written for organ and violin? Lemmens, Batiste, Wély, Guilmant, Widor, and Dubois represented France. England was deservedly represented by Smart, Best, Hollins, Lemare, and Sir John Stainer, whose contribution to the scheme was an Impromptu from the set of recently published "Six Pieces for Organ." A large measure of justice was done by Dr. Wilson to modern Italian organ music, the composers being Morandi, Fumagalli (by the "Capriccio alla Sonata"), Bossi, and Petrali, several of these works showing the marked advance made of recent years by Italian writers of organ music, in the recognition of the becoming dignity and breadth of style necessarily characterising music intended for "the king of instruments."

At recent recitals given by Mr. Fountain Meen in the Union Chapel, Islington, and at St. Peter-upon-Cornhill, the programmes included Serenade (Widor), Caprice (Wolstenholme), Fugue in F (E. Bernard), and other interesting pieces.

To lovers of organ music the recitals, all too few, which Sir Walter Parratt gives are matters of special interest. His recital on Mr. Gern's four-manual organ at St. John Baptist, Kensington, on the 17th ult., presented a scheme well calculated to display his fine technique, breadth of style, and sound judgment. The solos included Toccata in D minor (Bach), Andante Religioso (Liszt), Fantasia in F (Mozart), Sketch (Schumann), Prelude (Chaminade), "Scandinavische" (Rheinberger), and "Ita missa est" (Lemmens).

It will be remembered reference was made last month to the valuable and interesting recitals given by that accomplished master of the organ keyboard, Herr Fährmann, of Dresden. Mr. W. L. Hubbard, an esteemed correspondent now residing in that city, sends a special account of the succeeding performance, a matter in which English organists will be specially interested. The account is as follows:—

"The second German-English organ concert, given on the 11th ult., in St. John's Church, Dresden, by Herr Hans Fährmann, attracted an even larger audience than did the first"—notice of which was made in our last issue—"and proved that the endeavour to introduce to the Dresden public the chief creations of English organ composers is awakening the interest of music-lovers in the Saxon capital. It is gratifying that our native composers can have their works first made known to German auditors by one so thoroughly master of his instrument as is Herr Fährmann. Standing as he does among the very first of Dresden organists, and known as he is throughout Germany and Switzerland by virtue of successful concert appearances in the chief cities of those countries, his placing of any selection upon a programme is assurance of its finished and artistic performance.

"The numbers by English writers played at the late concert were Best's A minor Fugue, Battison Haynes's 'Introduction and Variations on a Ground Bass,' and W. G. Woods's Concert Fantasia and Fugue in C minor. Reviewing the concert in the Neueste Nachrichten, Otto Schmid, the well-known critic, wrote: 'The last two numbers' (Haynes's Introduction and Variations and Woods's Fantasia and Fugue) 'must be designated exceptional works. Both give evidence of rich, glowing creative power, the former in the strong, virile effectiveness of its construction, the latter in its finely elaborated middle part, wherein the melodic element, while bridled by masterly counterpoint, is given ample play, and finally merges into a Fugue built up on a splendid, noble theme. Both works received a performance that assured in advance their effectiveness."

The thanks and congratulations of British musicians are due to Herr Fährmann for his generous efforts in creating an intelligent interest in our modern organ music, and for efficiently illustrating the organ works of composers of all the chief musical nationalities in one of the world's principal art-centres.

Mr. W. E. Fairclough gave a recital, with a specially interesting programme, at All Saints' Church, Toronto, on the 6th ult. The scheme included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A major, Rheinberger's Sonata in C minor, "Andante Grazioso" (C. Swinnerton Heap), Scherzo in A minor (Best), and "Adagio" from Sonata, Op. 11 (Otto Dienel). Mr. A. H. Gibbons's scheme for a recital at Cirencester, on the 2nd ult., included music by Rheinberger, Guilmant, and Schumann. It is curious to note how frequently certain movements from the pianoforte music of the last-named composer are now being effectively played as organ pieces, although originally conceived under conditions calling for nice tone gradations, the result of the sense of touch peculiar to the pianoforte.

THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The twenty-seventh season of the Royal Choral Society was commenced, on the 11th ult., in a most auspicious manner with an exceptionally fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," under the conductorship of Sir Frederick Bridge. The choir has been increased by the addition of a considerable number of fresh voices and the volume of tone in the choruses was remarkably full and rich in quality. The rendering of the choral portions also showed that the familiarity of the work had not caused the rehearsals to be slighted. The tonal strength in the crescendi and diminuendi was finely graduated, and a very effective point was made by a sudden drop from forte to piano in the last bar of the first Baal chorus. In the chorus "Behold, God the Lord," the delivery of the words "And after the fire there came a still small voice" was made more than usually impressive by the preceding chord being held on loud until the end of the bar. These and several other points indicated painstaking rehearsal, which certainly had its reward. The chorus "Thanks be to God" might have been taken slower with advantage to its dignity, and the same remark applies to the tempo of "O rest in the Lord." Concerning Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley in such well-known music there is only need to say that each of these gifted artists was in excellent voice and gave adequate expression to their respective solos. Considerable interest was, however, centred in the principal contralto soloist, as this was the first occasion upon which Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli had been heard in London in oratorio. Mdlle. Ravogli's success was quickly put beyond a doubt. The necessary training has greatly improved her vocal means, she has acquired the broad and dignified style required in English oratorio, and her pronunciation, although slightly tinged by a foreign accent, is clear and emphatic. Contrary to expectation, Mdlle. Ravogli was more successful in the lyrical than in the dramatic portions, but this may be adduced as a proof of how excellently she has been trained and how thoroughly she has apprehended the requirements of her new departure. It should be added that able assistance was given by Miss Teresa Blamy, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. William Fell, and Mr. Harry Dearth, and that the double quartet and other concerted numbers have rarely been more beautifully sung.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

This veteran Society, now in its eighty-fifth year, has taken a new departure in instituting an autumn series of three concerts, for which the directors have engaged the well-known composers Grieg, Moszkowski, and Humperdinck to appear as conductors of their own works. Disappointment was keenly felt at the first concert of the series, on the 4th ult., owing to the non-appearance, through illness, of Dr. Edvard Grieg. In the regrettable absence of the Norwegian composer, Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie conducted the entire concert, and, let us add, with exceptional success. There was a marked and welcome improvement in the performances of the Philharmonic orchestra, which has not played so well for a long time. The scheme included Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, the solo portion of which was admirably interpreted by Mr. Frederick Dawson; the "Peer Gynt" Suite, and three of his songs, expressively rendered by Madame Marcella Pregi. The charmingly delicate manner in which the orchestra played "Anitra's Dance" from the Suite fully merited the encore which it received, a similar compliment being paid to the characteristic "Dance of the Imps." The concert, which commenced with the "Dead March in Saul," played as a tribute of respect to the memory of H.R.H. the Duchess of Teck, included Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture (No. 4) in E and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the latter in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the composer's death.

At the concert of the 18th ult. Herr Moritz Moszkowski made his first appearance before a London audience since June 2, 1886. By a strange coincidence the programmes of both concerts contained one of the three "great" symphonies of Mozart composed in 1788, one of the two great soprano airs of Beethoven, and a violin concerto. They were: in 1886, the G minor Symphony, "Ah! perfido," sung by Madame Christine Nilsson, and Beethoven's masterpiece for the violin, played by Ondricek; and at the last concert, the "Jupiter," "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" from "Fidelio," and Herr Moszkowski's melodious, refined, and fanciful, though lengthy Concerto (Op. 30) in C. The violinist on the 18th ult. was M. Charles Gregorowitsch, who combines a very agreeable, though small tone, and a remarkably fluent and "elegant" technique with a gift of unaffected expression, which was fully equal to such demands as the charming music made upon him. We cannot greatly admire Herr Moszkowski's ballet music to his opera "Boabdil, der letzte Maurenkönig." It is all highly effective and extremely clever orchestration and very little else. The melodic material is by no means remarkable and shows a decided falling off in freshness and inventive power generally when compared, say, with his delightful Spanish dances for pianoforte duet, which they otherwise resemble. Still, the three pieces (Malagueña, Scherzo-Valse, and Maurische Fantasie) are so bright, so strongly rhythmical, and so full of esprit that the charge of dulness cannot be made against them, and for this we are devoutly thankful. The Fantasie, being the most original as well as the noisiest of the three movements, was encored. Mdlle. Rosa Olitzka sang a long air, "Erfüllt mein Sehnen," from the same opera, which proved rather ineffective, and Beethoven's great air from "Fidelio." Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie conducted a very graphic and stirring performance of the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, and the ever wonderful "Jupiter" Symphony closed the concert.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

For the second Concert of the autumn series, on October 25, Herr Moritz Moszkowski's Orchestral Suite, No. 1, in F (Op. 39), was promised, but keen was our disappointment upon learning that, "owing to unforeseen circumstances," it could not take place. This was bad enough, but to substitute such a terribly hackneyed Wagner selection as the Vorspiel und Liebestod from "Tristan" was like adding insult to injury. Verily, the very titles of these two wonderful pieces of music will drive us away from concert halls before long! The programme included Berlioz's extravagant, though in parts beautiful and affecting, "King Lear" Overture (Op. 4); Dvorák's fresh, fascinating, and altogether delightful Symphonic Variations—a most welcome revival after his gruesome and childish Symphonic Poems; Smetana's brilliant and exhilarating "Lustspiel" Overture; and, last but not least, Schubert's magnum opus, the C major Symphony. An admirable programme (for, after all, we enjoyed the "Tristan" pieces as much as ever!) and admirably performed, on the whole.

At the third and last concert, yet another Wagner programme! It was less hackneyed than the average, or we should say nothing about it—e.g., the "Faust" and "Meistersinger" Overtures, Sachs's "Wahn, Wahn" Monologue, Pogner's "Address," and the Prelude to Act III.—all from "Die Meistersinger"—the closing scene from "Götterdämmerung," splendidly declaimed by Miss Marie Brema, the first scene from Act III. of "Siegfried," and Wotan's "Abschied und Feuerzauber" from "Die Walküre." These magnificent examples of the master's genius were performed in grandiose style. Dr. Richter is still facile princeps amongst conductors; at any rate, in such powerful music, which he presents with astonishing breadth and nobility and glow of colour, and with a clearness as regards its marvellous polyphony that no other conductor seems able to attain. Mr. Andrew Black sang the parts of Hans Sachs, Pogner, and Wotan (Wanderer), and Mdlle. Rosa Olitzka that of Erda in the "Siegfried" selection. Mr. Black did a large measure of justice to his task, but we derived but little satisfaction from the lady's laboured vocalisation.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

Mr. Schultz Curtius began his autumn series of Wagner concerts at the Queen's Hall, on the 9th ult., when the chief feature of the programme was Tschaïkowsky's ubiquitous "Pathetic" Symphony in B minor. Herr Mottl's inclination to exaggerate accentuation has led people to expect something new when a familiar work is heard for the first time under his direction. It is to be hoped that he is ignorant of this expectation, for the knowledge of it would be apt to prove embarrassing. Whether he knows of it or not, he certainly satisfied the anticipation in his reading of Tschaïkowsky's masterpiece, but it is doubtful if the unusual interpretation gave satisfaction. Certainly it did not to those who have studied Russian music, for the rendering of the work in its entirety was German in spirit, not Slavonic. No comment is necessary on the performances of Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture or the hackneyed "Ride of the Valkyries"; but the inclusion in the programme of Marschner's Overture to "Hans Heiling" was very acceptable, and the bright and genial music was admirably played. Herr van Rooy, who won such golden opinions at the recent Bayreuth festival, made his début in England in the charming aria "An jenem Tag," from Marschner's opera above-mentioned; but the baritone vocalist was more successful as Wotan in the second part of the last Act of "Die Walküre." In this he sang with great dignity and dramatic emphasis, and proved himself a worthy Wagnerian singer. The part of Brünnhilde was magnificently declaimed by Miss Marie Brema, who during the evening also sang with no less success Grieg's fine song "Henrik Vergeland" and Wagner's "Schmerzen" and "Attente."

The second concert took place on the 16th ult. and was chiefly remarkable for the impressive manner in which was rendered a selection from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." This embraced Siegfried's "Rhine journey," the Elegy on the hero's death, and the closing scene in which Brünnhilde's death song was magnificently delivered by Madame Ellen Gulbranson. This artist, who earlier in the programme had sung three songs by Grieg—"Solvejg's Lullaby," "Abend wie milde" (Evening, how tender), and "Mein Schwan" (My Swan)—made her first appearance in England on this occasion, and the rich and sympathetic quality of her voice and her dramatic and finished style fully justified the reputation she had acquired at the recent Bayreuth Festival. The other works in the programme were Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which in its entirety was finely interpreted; Bizet's first suite from his music to Alphonse Daudet's drama "L'Arlésienne," and the "Forest Music" from "Siegfried."

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS.

"It is an ill wind that blows no one any good" is a maxim complacently accepted by those who happen to profit by a social tempest, and it is applicable to ourselves with regard to M. Lamoureux's retirement as director of his famed Paris orchestra, for it has enabled Mr. Robert Newman to engage his services for a series of concerts by the Queen's Hall permanent orchestra, and the improvement which M. Lamoureux has already effected in this body is very notable. Greater unity of bowing has been secured, a more delicate pianissimo cultivated, and the tone of the brass made more even and sustained. At the first concert, on the 3rd ult., the most important work was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in E flat, which was given in memory of the late Duchess of Teck. The interpretation was remarkable for clearness of detail, and the delicate passages were beautifully rendered; but to English ears the heroic spirit of the work was not expressed with sufficient virility and masculine depth of sentiment. A very interesting feature of the concert was the performance of Tschaïkowsky's "Fantasia-Overture" entitled "Hamlet," which presumably has Shakespeare's play for its poetic basis. Imaginative minds may certainly trace in the themes and their treatment an appropriateness to the characters of the Danish Prince, the King, and Ophelia—some people may even find the mischief-working Ghost; but, apart from these associations, the music arouses and sustains the attention by reason of its tragic character and intensity, and leaves an impression not easily effaced. It was most effectively rendered, with all due energy in the strenuous passages and with finely graduated tonal force in the crescendi and diminuendi. The Larghetto from Dvorák's Serenade in E (Op. 22), the Prelude and Shepherd's air which open the third Act of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde"—the cor Anglais part in which was excellently played by M. F. Deneef—and the Overture to "Die Meistersinger" completed the programme.

Excellent performances of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat, and the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal" were given at the second concert, which took place on the 10th ult., and the interest of the programme was much increased by the inclusion of three pieces not previously heard in England. The first was the Prelude to "Armor et Ked," a lyrical drama in three acts, by Sylvio Lazzari, a native of Botzen, Austria. The libretto, by E. Jaubert, is based upon one of the legends of the Knights of the Round Table, and the prelude is stated to be specially meant as an introduction to the first Act, in which Armor wrests the crown of King Arthur from the Korrigans, who have concealed it on an island of the Armorican Sea. The Korrigans are uncanny folk, much given to singing, and the opening of the prelude is descriptive of their "mysterious harmonies." Judging from these harmonies, uttered softly by the strings, with occasional clashes on the cymbals, the Korrigans are not desirable people. A subject of considerable dignity representative of the sea and another of more vigorous character identified with the hero completes the thematic material, which is developed with great ingenuity and command of orchestral resource. The second novelty was a "Legend," entitled "Sauge-fleurie" (Sage-blossom), by Vincent d'Indy, and it has for its poetic basis a versified fairy tale by Robert de Bonnières, wherein the usual result of mutual sympathy between a fairy and a mortal is reversed, and the former dies. The music is thoroughly French in its conception and development, poetical and dainty, and most picturesquely scored. The concert was concluded with the fifth and last movement from Gustave Charpentier's suite "Impressions d'Italie." The number is entitled "Napoli," and aims to be a musical picture of Naples, "its population, its peculiar 'exterior' kind of life, and its joyfulness." The music is by turns vivacious, sentimental, gay, and irresponsible in expression, full of lively fancy and very cleverly scored. On another occasion it is to be hoped that M. Lamoureux will give the suite in its entirety. It would also be interesting and a graceful act were M. Lamoureux to include some English music at his future concerts.

QUEEN'S HALL SATURDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS.

The Saturday Afternoon Orchestral Concerts, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood, promise to form an important feature in London musical life. A magnificent reading of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony in B minor was given on October 30, and the same composer's "Overture Solennelle, 1812" (Op. 49), formed an interesting feature of the programme. This work was first heard in England at one of Mr. Henschel's London Symphony Concerts, on January 15, 1889, since which date it would seem to have been forgotten by orchestral conductors.

The programme is the invasion of Russia by Napoleon and his subsequent disastrous retreat from Moscow; but with the exception of deft use of the first phrase of the "Marseillaise," and the triumphant manner in which the Russian National Anthem is introduced, there is little that is realistic in the music, the apparent aim of which is to suggest a strenuous struggle, which it undoubtedly succeeds in doing. The delicacy with which the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was played merits record, and also the fine rendering given by M. Rivarde of the solo part of M. Saint-Saëns's third Violin Concerto in B minor. The concert was preceded by Handel's Dead March from "Saul," In Memoriam H.R.H. the Duchess of Teck.

The third concert, on the following Saturday, consisted of M. Saint-Saëns's Biblical opera "Samson and Delilah." The beauties of this work are, thanks to Mr. Newman's enterprise, now too well known to call for detailed criticism. The two chief characters were splendidly sustained by Mr. Edward Lloyd and Miss Marie Brema, Mr. Orme Darvall was efficient as the High Priest, and capable assistance was rendered by Messrs. Reginald Brophy, Edward Branscombe, Louis Frolich, and W. A. Peterkin. Chorus and orchestra entered sympathetically into the spirit of the work and the performance was highly effective.

Cornelius's merry Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" opened the concert on the 13th ult., and was followed by Tschaïkowsky's fascinating Suite from the "Casse-Noisette" ballet. The symphony chosen was Schubert's last one in C, which received a very impressive interpretation. The Scherzo and Finale were taken at a slower tempo than usual, which detracted from the vivacity of the music and in particular deprived the last movement of much of its irresistible force, although it increased its dignity and majestic character. Master Bruno Steindel played the solo part of the last two numbers of Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto with an ability and taste that should dictate his being rarely allowed to appear in public—for so phenomenally gifted a child should be carefully guarded from all undue excitement—and the concert was closed with a brilliant performance of Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody in F.

The programme on the 20th ult. contained Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, which was completed in December, 1854, and first performed in London at Mr. Walter Bache's sixteenth annual concert on March 11, 1880. Since the latter date the work has been neglected, which may in considerable measure be attributed both to the executive difficulties of the music and its extreme length. One cause of this length is the composer's adherence to orthodox symphonic form, which, in this instance, has resulted in unnecessary repetitions. The consequent "*un*heavenly length" is to be the more regretted because the "Faust" Symphony contains much of the finest music that Liszt wrote. Its melodies are the best the Weimar composer ever invented, and the central movement is for the most part very beautiful. The interpretation of the work was a striking testimony to the talent of Mr. Henry Wood and the efficiency of his forces, and it is to be hoped that if the work cannot be given again in its entirety, the second part at least may sometimes be heard. It should be added that the vocal peroration was well sung by Mr. Lloyd Chandos and the Queen's Hall Choir. The other orchestral pieces were the Prelude to Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" and Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture (No. 3), to both of which full justice was done. The programme was completed by Mr. Frederic Lamond, who played in a masterly manner the solo part of Rubinstein's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (Op. 70) and Liszt's enormously difficult "Don Juan" Fantasia.

There is much to commend in the selections of the above concerts, but the entire absence of works by British composers is to be deprecated. There is something anomalous in an English orchestra, conducted by an Englishman, entirely eschewing the compositions of their countrymen. Mr. Newman is an astute man, but in this procedure he is manifestly making a mistake or being led astray by bad advisers. There are many fine works by living Englishmen that only need to be made known to prove attractive. Taste grows by what it is fed on, and, if we mistake not, an appeal to national idiosyncrasies by the repetition now and again of such works as Cowen's "Scandinavian" or Cliffe's First Symphony would meet with reward.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

The three orchestral Dances, "From the Bavarian Highlands," which formed the novelty at the concert on October 23, and were placed at the end of the programme, proved worthy of the reputation which Mr. Edward Elgar has achieved in other fields of composition. They consist of a vivacious Dance (Allegretto), a charming lullaby in which a mazurka figure is cleverly dovetailed with a cradle song, and a piece called "The Marksmen." The pieces played form part of a suite in six numbers, for choir and orchestra, which it is to be hoped may be heard before long in its entirety. A new-comer, M. Jean Ten Have, a pupil of M. Ysaye, made a promising début in Saint-Saëns's familiar Violin Concerto in B minor, and Mr. Santley, who was very warmly received, sang.

Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony formed the pièce de résistance at Sydenham on October 30. The rendering given under Mr. Manns's direction was no doubt largely handicapped by the inexperience of the players, but the tempi were in many cases unusual and ineffective, especially in the second movement, in which at one moment the orchestra seemed to be positively groping after the rhythm. It is only fair to add that the third and last movements were given with much more spirit, but, as a whole, the performance fell seriously below the level of excellence associated with these concerts. Miss Fanny Davies played Mozart's D minor Concerto, which had not been heard at Sydenham for twelve years, and the vocalist was Miss Ella Russell. The programme was completed by the Prelude to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger" and the "Leonora" Overture (No. 3).

The unavoidable withdrawal—owing to the composer being unable to attend their rehearsal—of the Overtures to Mr. d'Albert's "Gernot" and "Der Rubin," which had been promised for the concert on the 6th ult., robbed the programme of its element of novelty. Mr. d'Albert played the solo in Beethoven's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto in masterly style, and the orchestra distinguished itself in the same master's Eighth Symphony. The programme also included Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture and songs from Mr. John Child.

Dr. Charles Vincent's "Storm" Overture, alternatively described as an "Orchestral Ballad in A minor," proved the novelty at the concert of the 13th ult. In this work, which was produced at Bradford in 1894, the composer has endeavoured to re-tell in music the incidents of Longfellow's "Wreck of the Hesperus," his themes representing "the schooner working its way over a wintry sea," "the skipper's little daughter," the "fearless skipper," the "storm," and the "prayer." The work is not epoch-making, but it is eminently meritorious. Mdlle. Wietrowetz gave a splendid rendering of the solo in Brahms's noble Violin Concerto as well as three minor pieces, including an encore, and Madame Marie Duma, who appeared at short notice in place of Mdlle. Zélie de Lussan, sang Elizabeth's "Greeting" from "Tannhäuser" with admirable spirit. The symphony was Schumann's beautiful work in C, of which Mr. Manns secured an excellent interpretation.

On the 20th ult. Herr Robert Hausmann, the admirable violoncellist of the Joachim quartet, made one of his welcome appearances as a soloist, choosing for his chief effort Dvorák's unequal but characteristic concerto, first heard at a Philharmonic concert last year, when it was introduced by Mr. Leo Stern, under the direction of the composer. Herr Hausmann's rendering of the solo was marked by his wonted breadth of phrasing and purity of style, qualities which were exhibited later on in a very fine performance of an Adagio and Allegro by Boccherini. The newly constituted orchestra showed marked improvement in ensemble in Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture, the playing of the wood-wind in the former work being vastly superior to their achievements earlier in the season. The vocalist was Mr. Edward Lloyd.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Contrary to his usual custom, Mr. Arthur Chappell issued a sort of prospectus respecting the fortieth season of these entertainments, which commenced on the 1st ult., giving the names of many who would appear during the early portion of the season. This is wise, for English amateurs like to know what they are paying for. The Frankfort Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Heermann, Bassermann, Koning, and Hugo Becker, were engaged for the first four concerts, and at once proved the perfection in ensemble to which they have attained in Mozart's Quartet in C (No. 6 of the set dedicated to Haydn). This was followed up by the interpretation of Beethoven's Quartet in F minor (Op. 95). Madame Blanche Marchesi, of course, gave much satisfaction as the vocalist.

Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 135), the last he ever wrote, and Schubert's beautiful but over-lengthy Quartet in D minor were the concerted works in the first of the Saturday programmes, and for a wonder there was no pianoforte solo; but Mr. Hugo Becker won acceptance in Marcella's quaint Violoncello Sonata in F, with Signor Piatti's tasteful accompaniment, and Madame Blanche Marchesi was again the vocalist.

On Monday, the 8th ult., the Frankfort Quartet made its last appearance and played Dvorák's piquant and characteristic Quartet in G (Op. 106), and, together with Mr. Hobday, Brahms's bright Quintet in F (Op. 88). Miss Katie Goodson was fairly successful in two minor pianoforte solos, and the same may be said of Miss Esther Palliser in songs by Brahms, Fauré, and Henri Falcke.

On Saturday, the 13th ult., new instrumental performers came on to the platform—that is to say, Mr. Kruse as leader, and Messrs. Haydn Inwards, who has succeeded Mr. Ries as second violin, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. Paul Ludwig. A splendid programme was provided, including Schumann's favourite Quartet in A minor (No. 1), Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26), and Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata in C (Op. 53). Mr. Eugene d'Albert was the pianist, and gave a superb rendering of the colossal sonata, alike in breadth, phrasing, and general intelligence, not to mention manipulative accuracy. Miss Rose Green was very pleasing as the vocalist.

Only brief notice is needed concerning the concert of the following Monday. The concerted works were Beethoven's Quartet in E minor (Op. 59, No. 2) and Brahms's late Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 101). The pianist, Miss Ella Pancera, selected as her solo no less exacting a work than Chopin's Sonata in B minor, in the performance of which she left something to desire. The execution was neatness itself, but warmth and passion seemed to be wanting. Mr. Plunket Greene may be heartily commended on his interpretation of a group of old songs and Professor Stanford's setting of the Clown's songs from "Twelfth Night."

A few remarks only are required concerning the concert of Saturday, the 20th ult. The programme opened with Haydn's cheerful Quartet in D (Op. 76, No. 5). Mr. Kruse introduced for the first time a Violin Sonata in D, by Tartini, edited by Professor Leonard, with pianoforte accompaniment arranged from the figured bass, excellently played by Mr. Henry Bird. Mdlle. Ella Pancera was somewhat deficient as to warmth of expression in Grieg's Ballade in G minor, though no fault could be found with her technique. The concert included Schumann's masterly Pianoforte Quartet in E flat (Op. 47), and Mr. Kennerley Rumford was acceptable as the vocalist.

The last concert we can notice this month is that of Monday, the 22nd. The programme was exceptionally interesting, and should have attracted a larger audience. It opened with a new Quartet in E flat, by Mr. Eugene d'Albert, having this peculiarity, that it commences with an Andante instead of an Allegro. This is not unprecedented, for Max Bruch opens his Second Violin Concerto with an Adagio. Mr. d'Albert's movement is elaborate but perfectly clear, and, so far as could be judged from a first hearing, interesting. Then we have an Allegro vivace, virtually a Scherzo, and next comes another slow movement, very expressive. The Finale is bold and vigorous, and worthily concludes a work that we should like to hear again. Mr. d'Albert gave a fine performance of Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), and the concert concluded with Tschaïkowsky's beautiful if melancholy Pianoforte Trio in A minor, dedicated to the memory of Nicolas Rubinstein. Miss Rose Green was again an agreeable vocalist.

GRIEG RECITAL.

Dr. Edvard Grieg's recital at St. James's Hall, on the 22nd ult., attracted an audience that not only filled the seats, but occupied the gangways. Such a large attendance is a striking proof of how widely this composer's music is known and appreciated in English homes, for in itself Dr. Grieg's pianoforte playing is not of that nature which attracts the multitude. It is tasteful and clearly phrased, and is remarkable for delicacy and daintiness; but in impassioned passages it is deficient in depth of sentiment, and, presumably from lack of muscular strength, his fortissimo playing is heavy and wanting in brilliancy. The most important works in the programme were the Pianoforte Sonata in E minor (Op. 7), the best movement of which is the third and last; the well-known Suite (Op. 40), "From Holberg's time," and the third Sonata for violin and pianoforte in C minor (Op. 45), the part for the former instrument being most effectively rendered by M. Johannes Wolff. The vocalist was Madame Medora Henson, who was most successful in her interpretations of "The Nightingale," "The way of the world," and "A Dream," which may be placed amongst the best of Dr. Grieg's compositions for the voice.

BRITISH CHAMBER MUSIC CONCERTS.

Mr. Ernest Fowles's "British Chamber Music Concerts," established in the interest of native talent, deserve the hearty support of all patriotic musicians, and it is gratifying to notice that the attendances at the performances are growing larger. The fourth season was commenced on October 26, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, when the concert was opened with Dr. Hubert Parry's scholarly Partita in D minor for pianoforte and violin, an excellent rendering of which was given by Mr. Ernest Fowles and Mr. Jasper Sutcliffe. Chief interest was, however, centred in the first performance of a String Quartet in G by Mr. Alfred Wall, the executants of which were Messrs. J. Sutcliffe, W. Sutcliffe, L. Fowles, and Whitehouse. The work shows decided advance on the violin sonata heard last season from the same pen. It consists of the usual four movements, the best of which are the second and third, respectively a melodious Andante sostenuto and a merry Scherzo. The programme was completed by Professor Stanford's fine Trio in E flat (Op. 35), some violoncello solos, admirably played by Mr. Whitehouse, and several pleasing songs which were daintily sung by Miss Kate Cove. Mr. Henry Bird was the accompanist.

The second concert, on the 9th ult., was opened with the first production by Messrs. J. Sutcliffe, W. Sutcliffe, L. Fowles, and A. Williams of a String Quartet in F, by Mr. Alfred Carnall. This is one of those works in which much has been accomplished and promise is given of still greater success in the future. It is unpretentious, but its lucidity and coherence make it very acceptable music, and the Intermezzo possesses, in addition to melodic charm, considerable originality. A feature of the evening was a Suite in D minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 19), by Miss Agnes Zimmermann, which was effectively rendered by the composer and Messrs. J. Sutcliffe and A. Williams. Miss Zimmermann also played some pianoforte solos and took part with Mr. J. Sutcliffe in Oliver King's Sonata in D minor (Op. 40). The vocalist was Mrs. Ambler-Brereton.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

Messrs. van Dooren and Bromley Booth coalesced in two violin and pianoforte recitals, the first of which took place at St. James's Hall on October 29. As a violinist Mr. Bromley Booth displayed rich quality of tone and excellent manipulation in Bach's Chaconne and miscellaneous solos. Mr. van Dooren can scarcely lay claim to a similar meed of praise. He essayed Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata with somewhat feeble results. The two artists were heard in conjunction in a genial suite by Hans Huber, a Swiss composer as yet too little known in this country.

Mr. Busoni, a pianist strange to London, has had the hardihood to announce six recitals at St. James's Hall, the first of which took place on October 28. The executant commenced in a manner calculated to irritate genuine amateurs by playing a ridiculous travesty of one of Bach's masterly Organ Preludes and Fugues, but he made amends by an interpretation of the whole of Chopin's Studies (Op. 25), which was of course somewhat unequal, but, on the whole, interesting.

The principal feature of the second recital, on the 12th ult., was Beethoven's longest and most difficult Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), which is very rarely played. To Mr. Busoni, however, the most arduous passages appeared but trifling, and the player seemed assured of his notes, interpreting the master's music with a measure of ease and assurance that many pianists might envy. Three pieces by Chopin were well played, but Mr. Busoni might have spared us two of those perversions of other musicians' workmanship for which pianists display a singular fondness, though they kindly place them at the beginning and end of their programmes.

The latest wonder child, and perhaps the most wonderful of them all, little Bruno Steindel, gave his first pianoforte recital at the Queen's Hall on October 26. With commendable judgment, the programme selected for him was brief and contained no very exacting matter. Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp (Op. 15, No. 2) and the same composer's Study in A flat (Op. 25, No. 1) were played in a manner that was nothing short of marvellous, technically speaking. Two of Mendelssohn's songs without words, a Mazurka by Benjamin Godard, and Stephen Heller's well-known Tarantella in A flat. Miss Clara Butt lent praiseworthy assistance with songs by Schubert, Schumann, Hahn, and Bemberg. A second recital was announced for the 30th ult., too late for notice this month.

Mr. Georg Liebling, a pianist new to London, gave his first recital, at St. James's Hall, on Monday, the 8th ult., and proved himself a sound executant, if not remarkable for artistic fervour, save when he forced his instrument and made the tone harsh. He was far more pleasing in pieces by Chopin and Schumann than in Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata. A concerto from Mr. Liebling's own pen shows good musicianship and falls gratefully on the ear, but the work must be heard with orchestra before any definite judgment can be formed upon it.

The first of two vocal recitals was given by Mr. Arthur Thompson, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 8th ult. A professor at the Royal Academy of Music and the Guildhall School of Music might be easily absolved from appearing in public, but it may be readily said that Mr. Thompson's voice is agreeable, and that he was heard to advantage in songs by Scarlatti, Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, Hatton, Clay, and Hawley. Mr. Emile Sauret played some violin solos effectively, though they were not of the highest class.

The concert given by Miss Ella Pancera at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, the 10th ult., may be described as a recital with orchestral accompaniment. The young pianist is not the first who has essayed three concertos at one sitting, and the practice cannot be commended. However, it may be ceded to Miss Pancera that she played Grieg's work in A minor, Chopin's in E minor, and Liszt's in A with irreproachable neatness, if with insufficient warmth and passion. Mr. Hamish MacCunn conducted, and secured a good performance of his picturesque Overture "The Land of the Mountain and the Flood."

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE'S MUSIC TO "THE LITTLE MINISTER."

The requirements of incidental music to a play have seldom been more felicitously fulfilled than in the music written by Sir Alexander Mackenzie for Mr. J. M. Barrie's dramatised version of his novel "The Little Minister," produced, on the 6th ult., at the Haymarket Theatre. Perhaps the greatest merit that incidental music, played during the action of a piece, can possess is that it should suggest and emphasize the situation while yet being unobtrusive. This Sir Alexander's strains most happily accomplish, witness the deft introduction of "Bonnie Laddie" in the expressive mélodrame heard as the secret panel in the hall of Rintoul Castle glides aside and Babbie, the heroine, enters after her wild endeavour to meet her lover. The familiar Scotch air and that of "Duncan Gray" are also heard in the overture, which is a fully developed example of this form, and remarkable for vivacity and expressive passages, especially that of the beautiful second subject, and it ends with a "reel" in a most stirring manner. It is scored for full orchestra, and should be speedily heard in our concert-rooms. A melodious Allegretto, called a "Lilt," bracketted with an arrangement of one of the composer's pieces "From the North," well prepare the mind for the impromptu tea party in Nanny's cottage, in which Babbie completes her subjugation of "The little minister," and for the more dramatic action which, in the second scene of this act, takes place in the minister's garden. A "Pastoral Dance," which incites the feet to move, precedes the third act, and an "Ecossaise" of great vigour and sustained energy prepares the way for the stirring and laughter-moving incidents of the last act. These entr'actes have been arranged by the composer and published as an orchestral suite, in which form they should prove attractive additions to any concert programme. It may be added that the music was played on the opening night under the direction of Mr. D. Nemes, as effectively as circumstances would permit, and that the overture and entr'actes elicited much applause from the audience.

GREEK MUSIC.

Two recitals of unusual interest and attractiveness were given respectively on October 28 and the 5th ult., in St. James's Hall, by Mr. Aramis, the Greek baritone. The programme consisted of Greek popular music, chiefly songs, and vocal and choreographic illustrations of dancing in past centuries. The songs were nearly all selected from the fine but little known collection of modern Greek folk-songs made some years ago by M. Bourgault Ducoudray, professor of musical history at the Paris Conservatoire. They are very simple in form, but the majority of the melodies are highly expressive, sometimes of great dignity, and they are rendered peculiarly distinctive by being written either in the ancient Greek modes or in a scale termed by M. Ducoudray the "Oriental Chromatic," which is formed of two similar tetrachords joined by a whole tone and severally consisting of a semitone, minor third, and semitone—as, for instance, E, F, G sharp, A (tonic note), and B, C, D sharp, E. The songs were most effectively interpreted by Mr. Aramis and Miss de Saint-André, who are both accomplished vocalists; and in order to illustrate the ancient Greek dance, so eulogistically spoken of by classic poets, Mdlle. Sandrini, première danseuse of the Paris Opéra, went through a series of gestures illustrative of the sentiment of two of the songs while they were being sung. Mdlle. Sandrini has been taught the remarkably graceful movements of the Greek dances by M. Hansen, of the Paris Opéra, who has made a special study of the subject, and they may best be described as living productions of the diaphanously clad figures seen on old Greek vases, from which the postures have, in fact, been derived. In the second part of the programme Mdlle. Sandrini illustrated the popular and fashionable dances of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, the music being played by M. Ducoudray, who also had prepared a brief paper describing the origin and nature of the measures. This, translated into English, was read by Mr. E. F. Jacques, who, in the earlier part of the afternoon, had described with great lucidity the peculiarities of the Greek scales and the notable features of the songs.

MUSIC TO "THE WASPS."

A special feature of the series of performances at the Cambridge Theatre of Aristophanes's "The Wasps," in the original Greek, was the music composed by Mr. T. Tertius Noble, the organist of Ely Cathedral. The play itself—particularly as interpreted by the members of the University, on the 19th ult.—is little more than farce; but there is nothing extravagant in Mr. Noble's twelve numbers of varying length, four of which are purely instrumental. The music suggests the absurdity of the action without descending to its occasionally pantomimic level. The overture is an imposing, neatly constructed piece, exhibiting sound musicianship in combination with a sense of humour and facility in quietly expressing it. Though, of course, shorter, the preludes to the second and third acts also show knowledge of effect. The composition of incidental and entr'acte music is so seldom a thankful task that Mr. Noble may be congratulated upon the attention bestowed by the audience upon the orchestral pieces. Considering the limits within which it was imperative to keep, the music for the chorus (representing the "Wasps") must be pronounced bold and vigorous. Simple effects were, in the main, relied upon, and they did not miss their mark; but that Mr. Noble can pen something more massive is demonstrated by the "Hymn to Apollo," written in four parts (the tenors as well as the basses being divided). Though brief, this number evinces power to rise to the dramatic opportunity. Altogether Mr. Noble, who was trained at the Royal College of Music, did credit to his instructors, at least one of whom (Professor Stanford) was present. The choral portions were sung with commendable energy and accuracy.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Proofs of conscientious study and good training were much in evidence at the chamber concert given on the 1st ult., at St. James's Hall, by the students of the Royal Academy of Music. Decided talent was shown by Miss Marjorie Hayward, a juvenile violinist, in the Allegro from Rode's Sixth Concerto in B flat, and there was much to commend in Mr. Claude F. Pollard's rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in C sharp minor (Op. 27, No. 2) and in Mr. Percy Egerton's and Mr. Cuthbert Whitemore's performance of a smoothly written Introduction and Rondo for clarinet and pianoforte by a fellow-student, Mr. William H. Reed. Mr. Dezsö Kordy also played two violoncello pieces with much taste, and the ensemble class, conducted by M. Sauret, gave an excellent interpretation of Jensen's Ländlische Serenade. The most successful of the vocalists was Miss Ethel Wood, who sang with admirable clearness of articulation three attractive songs, severally named "In the forest," "A summer love-tale," and "Life's morning," by Tschaïkowsky. Three MS. songs, showing much promise and musical feeling, and respectively named "'Twas in the glorious month of May," "Since my Love now loves me not," and "The Butterfly is in love with the Rose," by Mr. Garnet W. Cox, were also sympathetically sung by Miss Margaret Cooper.

The Sir Michael Costa Scholarship has been awarded to R. Neville Flux (of Bromley, Kent). The examiners highly commended A. von Ahn Carse.

Mr. Edgar F. Jacques will give three lectures, on January 12, 19, and 26. The subjects will comprise the music of Hindostan and the East, that of Greece, and the influence of these on the European music of the Middle Ages.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

For the sake of keeping our record of the doings at the College complete, we must briefly mention that at the 251st concert, on the 2nd ult., Mendelssohn's C minor Trio (Op. 66) was played by Florence Smith, Kitty Woolley, and Edward Mason; and Beethoven's String Quartet in the same key (Op. 18, No. 14), by William Read, C. Barré Squire, Edward Behr, and R. Purcell Jones. Thomas Dunhill was announced to perform Schumann's Fantasia for pianoforte (Op. 17), and Ivor Foster and Sarah Davies to sing songs by Schubert and Scarlatti. Our representative was, unfortunately, prevented from attending. The following concert, on the 12th ult., was orchestral. Brahms's Serenade in A without violins (Op. 16) is now very rarely played, and we can scarcely hope to hear so unsensational a work at an important public concert. The absence of the violins from the little score (double quartet of wood-wind, two horns, and lower strings) must needs create a feeling of monotony as regards colour when all the five movements are played, and only the most finished performance, especially on the part of the wind, can prevent it. Such a performance was not forthcoming on the occasion under notice. Beauty of tone and finish of phrasing were occasionally conspicuous by their absence, while in the Adagio the melody did not always stand out with sufficient clearness. That of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," on the other hand, was quite excellent. Beethoven's Second Symphony was also well played. Samuel Grimson again distinguished himself by overcoming the difficulties of the solo part in Joachim's Variations in E minor for violin and orchestra as if they were naught. He also played with more expression than usual—a good sign. Muriel Foster, in Purcell's splendid scene "Mad Bess," and Eleanor Jones, in Micaela's beautiful song (Bizet's "Carmen"), represented everything that is best in the teaching of singing at the College.

At the chamber concert, on the 19th ult., a set of variations for flute and pianoforte, by Thomas Dunhill, a scholar, was produced and excellently played by Mr. Eli Hudson and the composer. "Variations for the flute" were familiar enough in the days of our grandfathers. Mr. Dunhill's work is not only exceedingly clever, but decidedly interesting. There is a great deal of real and even beautiful music in it, varying "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." The pianoforte has a very important part, which occasionally reaches a considerable degree of expressiveness. That much brilliant work is provided for the wind instrument need hardly be said. We recommend the work heartily to lovers of the "am'rous flute." Another English composer included in the programme was Mr. H. Walford Davies, a former scholar and now a professor at the College, whose fine, manly, and effective songs, "A farewell" (Burns) and "Hymn before action" (Kipling), were sung with a good deal of dramatic feeling by Katherine Kips, whose voice, however, showed signs of over-exertion and whose production was somewhat laboured and throaty. A similar throaty production was displayed by Agatha Macken in Schira's tedious song "Sognai," but her voice is a bright high soprano of good quality. Ralph Courtier-Dutton, a somewhat heavy bass-baritone, sang Tschaïkowsky's Spanish Serenade, entitled "Don Juan," to German words. (Query, why sing a German translation of a Russian poem by Tolstoi when, doubtless, a very good English version can be obtained?) Beatrice la Palme (violin) and Edith F. Ridgeon (pianoforte) played Grieg's Sonata in G (Op. 13) and pleased the audience greatly. The violinist must be credited with the possession of that precious thing, temperament, but at present it is apt to run away with her. The long and exhausting programme also included Haydn's String Quartet in G (Op. 64), of which a sonorous and spirited, though occasionally somewhat rough performance was given by Daisy Wishart, Kitty Woolley, Ernest Tomlinson, and R. Purcell Jones; and Brahms's great Pianoforte Quintet in F minor (Op. 34), in which the last-named two gentlemen were joined by Maud Gay (a refined and gifted pianist, though a little overweighted in so masculine a work), Mary Noverre, and William Read. A word of praise must be given to William Scott for the excellent way in which he accompanied the songs.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The annual presentation of prizes to the successful students of this prosperous Institution took place at the Guildhall on October 30, the ceremony being performed (in the absence of the Lady Mayoress) by Miss Mary Morrison, daughter of the chairman of the music committee of the Corporation. The distribution was preceded by a concert given by the choir and several of the more advanced pupils. Among the leading features were Miss Bessie Spells's neat rendering of "Let the bright Seraphim," Mr. Isaac Epstein's skilful performance on the pianoforte of a Toccata by Mdlle. Chaminade, Mr. Boxall's sympathetic playing of Chopin's Funeral March (in memory of the Duchess of Teck), and the spirited execution by the choir of Ravenscroft's madrigal "In the merry spring," Barnby's "Gather ye rosebuds," and Mr. W. H. Cummings's "Domine dirige nos."

In the course of his report Mr. Cummings (the principal) stated that the school now had 3,600 students. A very gratifying incident of a year rich in good, earnest work was that one of the prize-winners, Mr. Boxall, had played at concerts at Brussels and Ostend with such success that he had been asked to go to Paris. Doubtless Mr. Boxall and others would soon spread the fame of the Guildhall School throughout the world. Of the fifteen pupils who had passed the necessary examinations for the Associate diploma, Miss Lily Rendle (pianoforte) obtained the gold medal, Miss Lilian Clarke (pianoforte) the silver medal, Mr. Henry Sowerbutts (singing) the bronze medal, and honours were the distinction of Miss Adeline Cox (elocution) and Miss Minnie S. Crouch (pianoforte). The winners of the special prizes included Miss Bessie Spells, Lord Mayor's, for soprano; Mr. Douglas Boxall, Lady Mayoress's, for pianists; Miss Lina Harwood and Miss Edith Clegg, the two Sheriffs', for mezzo-soprano and contralto respectively; Mr. Frank Grant, the chairman's, for organists; Mr. C. Hinchliff, Lady Knight's, for baritones or basses; Miss Nellie Hills, the Jenkinson, for pianists; Miss E. Gwynne Kimpton, the Taylor gold medal, for the most distinguished student; Miss Bertha Bruckshaw, the Tubbs bow for violinists, a special prize being also awarded by the judge to Miss Dora Davidson; Mr. H. W. Reeves, the Hill prize, for the most deserving violin student; Miss Fanny Woolf, the Carwardine purse, for violinists; Mr. D. Boxall, the Dove memorial, for general excellence, assiduity, and industry; Miss Emily Kingsford, the Newman, for sight-singing; Miss Lily Wootton, the Pelzer purse, for mandolinists; and Mr. H. Waldo Warner, the Cobbett, for harmony. There were many school prizes awarded, besides certificates of merit.

TRINITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

At St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street, on the 8th ult., Mr. George C. T. Hartley, M.P., presented the prizes and certificates awarded by the local committee. The report stated that during the past session the entries had considerably increased, whilst the high standard required had been well met. In moving the adoption of the report, which he said was highly satisfactory, Mr. Hartley complimented the College upon the success it had achieved. At its beginning the Institution had many difficulties, but they were all overcome. Music had made vast strides in this country during Her Majesty's reign and had now become part of its national system of education. He was sure that a knowledge of music tended to brighten and to humanise, and was a distinct benefit to the nation at large. Dr. Turpin, in seconding the motion, said wonderful progress had marked the existence of the College since its establishment a quarter of a century ago.

For efficient work in divers branches of the art silver medals were given to Edmund A. Reeve (for harmony and counterpoint), Winifred N. Drew (theory), Herbert Briggs (theory), Adeline M. Jones (pianoforte playing), Elsie M. Coventry (solo singing), Nellie Spence (violin playing), and Ernest Bonner (violoncello playing). Bronze medals went to Theodore M. Louy (pianoforte playing), Eleanor A. P. McGuire (solo singing), Violet G. Handley (violin playing), and Ralph R. Jones (organ playing). A number of other prizes were distributed before the proceedings terminated.

Candidates for the diploma of Associate in Music at Trinity College, in January next, will be permitted for the first time to work the papers at certain of the more important provincial centres, including Edinburgh, Liverpool, Manchester, Bolton, Bristol, and probably others, as well as at the College in London. The examinations in the matriculation subjects and for the higher certificates in theoretical subjects (harmony, counterpoint, &c.) will also be held at these important provincial centres as heretofore.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

Sir Frederick Bridge began his winter course of music lectures in connection with Gresham College on the 8th ult., at the City of London School. At the first discourse the lecturer resumed the subject of the development of the oratorio and dealt with the writings of Carissimi, Stradella, and Scarlatti. The first-named, who died in 1674, was shown to be the chief agent in the transition from the mediæval to the modern style. In his compositions could be heard the coming footsteps of Handel, and when this master did come he borrowed largely from the works of the Italian composer. Carissimi's oratorio "Jephtha" seemed to have exercised a considerable influence over Handel. The music showed Carissimi's addiction to word painting, in illustration of which the lecturer mentioned "When the King of Ammon" and "Come, strike the merry timbrels," which were respectively sung by Mr. Daniel Price and Miss Gambogi. Stradella wrote voluminously and left behind him 148 works at Modena. A notable feature in his oratorio "John the Baptist," written in 1676, was that it was the first work in which sharps and flats were figured in the clef. It betrayed the influence of Carissimi, and opened with three short movements in fugal style. Its choruses were long and somewhat intricate. Scarlatti was said to have been born in 1659. He was the founder of the Neapolitan School, which was distinguished for its devotion to graceful melody, and there was internal evidence in his writings that he was a pupil of Carissimi. Two songs of melodious character by Scarlatti were subsequently sung respectively by Miss Gambogi and Miss Holding.

The second and fourth lectures were devoted to Johannes Brahms, who, the lecturer said, had been spoken of as almost the last of the classical composers, because he had followed the lines of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. His attitude towards the emotional school, the school of the Wagnerites, had been greatly exaggerated. Brahms was severe to himself, but tolerant towards others. He entertained a sincere respect for Wagner. Being asked on one occasion his opinion on one of Wagner's operas, he answered: "We must all of us listen to Wagner with our own ears." At the first of these discourses on Brahms a comprehensive series of the master's songs was sung by Madame Robiolio and Mr. Paul England, and at the second lecture was played the Trio in E flat (Op. 40) for pianoforte, violin, and horn, the executants being Miss Annie Grimson, Miss Jessie Grimson, and Mr. Thomas Busby.

Appealing to a smaller circle, but of no less artistic interest, was the lecture delivered on the 11th ult., when the subject was the development of English organ music. The period covered was from Dr. Maurice Greene (1696?-1755) to the death, in 1858, of Thomas Adams. Organ composers during this time were overshadowed by Handel and hampered by the imperfect state of their instruments. There was no evidence of the introduction of pedals into England earlier than 1790. The dulciana stop was first introduced during the last century at St. Margaret's, Lynn. In 1726 the first octave coupling was made by Bishop. Much interesting and instructive information was given concerning Dr. Maurice Greene, John Stanley, Dr. Dupuis, Samuel Wesley, and Thomas Adams, examples of whose music were admirably played on the organ in the hall by Mr. Walter Alcock.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The twenty-third session of the Musical Association was begun at the Royal College of Organists on the 9th ult., when a paper entitled "Some points in Bach's treatment of the chorale" was read by Mr. H. Davey. A somewhat novel view was taken of Bach and his life-work, the lecturer declaring that it was a mistake to look upon Bach merely as a scientific composer; that he was a work-a-day practical musician, who was probably regarded in his time as a producer of popular music. Moreover, the lecturer expressed his opinion that Bach did not intend the congregation to join in the singing of the chorales inserted in his church works, because he altered the harmonies to enforce the significance of the words and also had not hesitated to even alter the melodies.

Professor Prout, who occupied the chair, differed from the lecturer's view of Bach ever having been or becoming a popular composer. He was not ashamed to say that he was fifty years of age before he appreciated Bach at anything like his true worth. It would probably be more correct to say that Bach was the young musician's admiration, but the old musician's adoration. He agreed, however, with Mr. Davey that probably the congregation did not join in the singing of the chorales. Sir John Stainer took exception to this last observation. If the chorales were not intended for the people to join in they were redundancies, inasmuch as provision was made in the solos, &c., for the reflective element. He questioned also if the alterations and floriations of the familiar melodies would prevent the congregation joining in the chorales. At St. Paul's Cathedral nothing would deter the congregation taking part in a popular tune, and it was noticeable that Bach accompanied the chorales with the full force at his command.

LONDON CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

The twenty-fourth annual festival took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 18th ult., when sixty-two metropolitan churches were represented by a body of choralists totalling over 1,000. This large force was so well under the control of Sir George Martin that excellent effects of light and shade were produced throughout. Sung under such conditions, Sir John Stainer's fine anthem "Lord, Thou art God," so admirably suited to the occasion, proved more than ordinarily impressive. Corresponding success attended the introduction of the conductor's spirited and telling Jubilee Te Deum, which adds fresh friends to an already extensive list every time it is heard. The steady and expressive rendering of these compositions convincingly testified to the efficiency of the choir. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Mr. J. T. Field's setting in D, and the chants selected for the Psalms were by the late Mr. William Hodge, formerly assistant-organist at the Cathedral. In the hymns, "My God, I thank Thee who hast made the earth so bright" (Sir George Martin's setting), "Praise, my soul," "Now severed is Jordan," and "With laud and thanksgiving," the congregation filling the Cathedral heartily joined. Mr. C. Macpherson presided at the organ, and an appropriate sermon was preached by the Bishop of London.

THE HENNIKER CHORAL COMPETITION IN SUFFOLK.

With the laudable idea of fostering and increasing the love of music in the locality of her residence, the Hon. Miss Henniker started, several months since, a scheme called "The Henniker Choral Competition," the objects of which were "to offer inducements to the diligent study or practice of music, and to bring young and talented musicians to the front; to enable competitors to trace their weaknesses or observe their strong points by comparing each other's performances; to interest the public in good music and local resources, and to bind together all who love music, whether as teachers, conductors, singers, or players, for the common purpose of advancing musical art." To practically carry out these worthy objects Miss Henniker associated with herself a strong executive committee, consisting of professional and amateur musicians residing in Ipswich, Bury St. Edmunds, and the immediate neighbourhood. So hearty has been the response to the invitations of the committee that upwards of 400 voices, representing fourteen choirs, embracing not only church choirs but also children from several elementary schools, gathered at the inaugural trial of skill at Stowmarket on the 6th ult. To give all a fair chance the competitions were divided into junior and senior. Want of space compels us to omit the names of the various choirs engaged; but so keen was the struggle for supremacy that Mr. Arthur Somervell, who acted as judge (Dr. Bates, of Norwich, having officiated in that capacity earlier in the day), had considerable difficulty, in several cases, to make his awards. In addition to choral works, a class was devoted to sight-reading for children under fifteen, but this only brought two entries, one of which failed to put in an appearance, so that the prize went by default to the other choir. Perhaps the most interesting (and certainly the most necessary) competition was "accompaniment at sight," open to organists, schoolmasters, schoolmistresses, and amateurs. This brought a large entry and very close competition. The prizes were distributed by Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., who subsequently delivered a short address on "Music." In the evening an attractive concert was given, conspicuous places in the programme being filled by several of the prize-winners. It is to be hoped the initial success of the movement may lead to similar efforts in different parts of East Anglia.

REVIEWS.

Technique and Expression in Pianoforte Playing. By Franklin Taylor. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Franklin Taylor is an acknowledged specialist on the subject of pianoforte teaching. Moreover, he has the gift of being able to state his views and the results of his long experience in language that is concise and free from ambiguity; he is always intelligible. The author, in his preface, says: "This book is the result of an endeavour to set down my ideas in a systematic form, and I put it forth in the hope that it may prove of service to some of my fellow-teachers, as likewise to any earnest student of the pianoforte who may be led by his interest in the subject to read what I have written." As to the general excellence of Mr. Taylor's lucid style, we cannot do better than quote, and at the same time fully endorse, the remark of an eminent authority, who, having read all through this book, said to the present writer: "There is not a superfluous word in it."

Mr. Taylor divides his "words of wisdom" under the following eight headings: Introductory, Technique, Fingering, Rhythm, Phrasing, Expression, Ornaments, and Methods of Study. The chapter on "Technique" is not disfigured with a mass of printer's ink of dreary forbidding exercises, which is the usual repulsive method of demonstrating that subject; but it contains valuable hints, very clearly put, on this important equipment of the pianist. In these days of abnormal technique and the too prominent attention given to its development in the student's curriculum, it is satisfactory to learn that an artist like Mr. Taylor does not estimate technique per se "as an end," but "as a means to an end" in pianoforte playing. The remarks on fingering are most valuable; and in this connection the author's use of the (so-called) "foreign" fingering in his numerous musical examples in the text is much to be commended. The all-important subject of rhythm also receives ample treatment. "If the music is to be intelligible to the listener," says Mr. Taylor, "its rhythm should be made clear." Again: "It should never be forgotten that the listener has not the advantage possessed by the player of seeing the written music, but must receive all his impressions through the sense of hearing only, and that his power of understanding must therefore depend on his being able to perceive the equal duration of the bars and the regularly recurring accents at the beginning of the bars, or of portions of them."

One of the most valuable chapters in the book is probably that on "Phrasing," which may be said to represent the often lacking poetical side of pianoforte playing. This is a subject to which our author has given special attention and in which he may be looked upon as a safe guide to the teacher and student—if, indeed, the good teacher ever ceases to be a student. A great deal might be said on the use of the slur as a phrasing sign, as distinct from a mere legato direction. In illustration of this, Mr. Taylor gives an example from Beethoven's Op. 28, showing "the old-established mode of marking legato" in comparison with "the more elaborate method employed by so many modern editors." Some composers of the present day, who often seem to have very hazy ideas as to the importance of slur signs, might study this useful chapter with advantage. Expression, which is adequately and exhaustively treated in the next chapter, is the twin sister of phrasing. Mr. Taylor appropriately says in one of the many aphorisms which abound in this book, "In its fullest sense, expression may be taken to mean the power of conveying to the listener the emotions which the music has awakened in the performer, and the pianist who plays most expressively is he who is deeply impressed by the music he plays, always provided he has at command the means of expressing his feelings adequately."

The two remaining chapters, on "Ornaments" and "Methods of Study," though of a more technical nature, convey most valuable information upon important though often doubtful points. It is impossible within the limits of a short notice to give a tithe of the good things that are to be found in the pages of this useful book. The reader must himself make the acquaintance of the volume. It will be found invaluable to all teachers of the pianoforte. We must add that the text is copiously interspersed with examples in music type, which are of enormous advantage to those who study its interesting contents. There is also an index; and we hope that an index of the musical examples will be provided in a second edition, which should be speedily called for.

We understand that H.R.H. Princess Christian has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of Mr. Taylor's book, which it has been our pleasure to speak of in terms of high and deserved commendation.

In the Choir of Westminster Abbey. A story of Henry Purcell's days. By Emma Marshall.
[Seeley and Co., Limited.]

Mrs. Marshall has made several successful excursions into the region of the historical story. This, her latest contribution of the kind, has special interest to musical readers, as it relates to and tells of one of England's greatest musicians. The narrative, embracing the period between 1684 and 1695 (the latter being the year of Purcell's death), is told by a certain "Betty Lockwood," the heroine of the story, who was what we should now call a lady-help in the household of Henry Purcell. Mrs. Marshall acknowledges her indebtedness to Mr. William H. Cummings, who is the greatest authority on Purcell, for many of the incidents which, through the medium of "Betty Lockwood," she relates. Therefore, so far as the actual facts are concerned, she is on safe ground; but the Purcell domesticalities recorded in these pages are of necessity flights of her imagination. If the story, apart from its historical interest, is cast in a somewhat slender and unexciting form, Mrs. Marshall writes intelligently and sympathetically, and "In the Choir of Westminster Abbey" might with advantage find its way into the hands of young musical folk. The book, which is appropriately dedicated to the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, Precentor of Westminster, is enriched with seven illustrations of the Abbey and its surroundings in the seventeenth century, drawn by Mr. T. Hamilton Crawford. The frontispiece is a portrait of Purcell, from the fine painting by Sir Godfrey Kneller, in the possession of Mr. Alfred Littleton.

Carols for the Seven Feasts of Christmas. By Frank J. Sawyer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These carols are severally and specially designed for Christmas Day, and the feasts of St. Stephen, St. John, Holy Innocents, Circumcision (New Year's Day), the Epiphany, and the Purification. With the exception of the first, in which use has been made of traditional words, the text has been supplied by the composer, who in his lines has successfully imitated the old style of phraseology. The music is written for the usual four voices, but may also be sung in two parts. It is simple in character as such music should be, but it bears the imprint of a master's hand and is a welcome addition to the music of the approaching season.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D. The Office of the Holy Communion. By Alfred J. Eyre. [Weekes and Co.]

Mr. Eyre's settings of the Evening Canticles make considerable use of voices in unison, with effective contrast provided by four-part vocal harmony. The organ part possesses some independence, but the music is simple in character. The Communion Service is more ambitious, but it contains few difficulties, and, well rendered, would be decidedly impressive.

Novello's Christmas Carols. Nos. 269-275.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The latest additions to this series are excellent examples of this class of music. Nos. 269, 270, and 271 have been supplied by J. Varley Roberts and are severally entitled "Shepherds, leave your flocks," the text written by F. J. W. Crowe; "Heavenly music clearly ringing," written by the Rev. Chaloner Greville; and "Silent night! Holiest night!" the words being from a German source. In the first of these the first four lines of each verse are intended to be sung by a soprano, the other lines being set in four-part vocal harmony. A similar method has been pursued in the second example, but the first four lines in this may be sung in two parts, stated to be soprano, but more suitable for soprano and alto. "Silent Night" is set to a melodious tune in 6-8 rhythm for the four usual voices, and, in common with the preceding carols, is easy and grateful to sing. No. 272, "Angels singing, bright stars beaming," words and melody by Nicolas Saboly, the music arranged by John Henry Mee, is contrapuntal in style and is interesting and charming. Choirmasters with well-trained forces should not neglect this carol. The same composer has furnished No. 273, entitled "Little children, wake and listen." This is much simpler in character and provides opportunities for soprano and tenor solos. "Blessed Babe! the straw is spread," No. 274, words by I. J. Postgate, music by Herbert W. Wareing, possesses much vivacity and is decidedly pleasing. It is written in four-part harmony throughout. No. 275, "Ring the bells, the Christmas bells," has words by Agnes Burney and music by the late Sir Joseph Barnby, and its strains attest to the skill of this musician in writing effectively for voices in harmony. The descent of the basses through an octave on a fourth, while the other voice parts ascend, most happily illustrates the subject of the text.

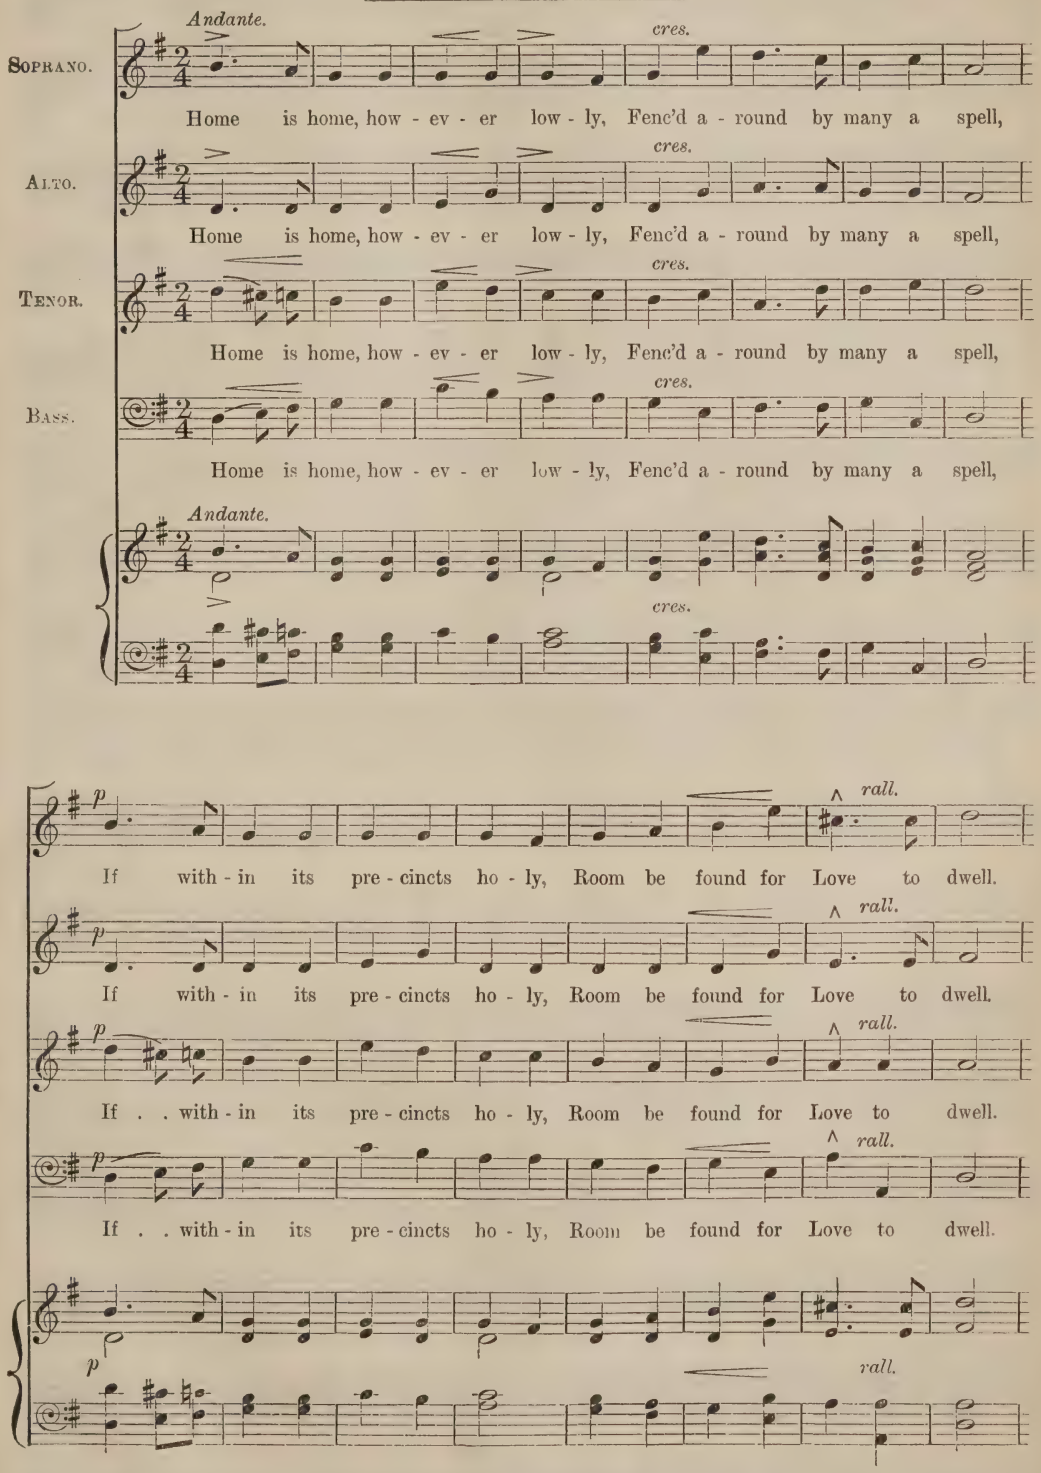
Prelude in F minor. Romance in A flat. Étude in F. For pianoforte solo. Op. 42. By A. Arensky.
Our Queen. March. For pianoforte solo. By H. M. Higgs.
Romance. For violin and pianoforte. By Hamilton Clarke.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

M. Arensky is one of the most finished writers of the modern Russian school, and the pieces under review are calculated to increase the favourable impression his music has already made in this country. The "Prelude," in particular, is a graceful and melodious example of its kind, by no means difficult and decidedly effective. The "Romance" is still more easy to play, and chiefly demands a pianist with a sympathetic touch, by whom the music could be made to suggest a very pleasing story. The "Etude" is built upon a simple figure which lays well under the hand, and when played as marked, Allegro molto, has a very brilliant effect and enhances the charm of a pleasing melody.

Mr. Higgs has written a vivacious quick march, the trio of which is formed of an arrangement of Sir Joseph Barnby's patriotic part-song "Victoria—our Queen!" The first subject is exceedingly bright and the treatment of the part-song is very effective, while its martial character provides an excellent contrast to the preceding and following strains. The music is very simple and easy to read at sight.

Mr. Clarke's "Romance" is of a placid and tuneful nature and is suggestive of "the course of true love that did run smooth." Violinists of moderate executive abilities will find this an agreeable piece and one which will show their attainments to the best advantage.

Twelve Pianoforte Pieces. By Granville Bantock.
[Forsyth Brothers.]



Mr. Granville Bantock is one of the most promising composers of what may be termed the young English school of writers, and his recently published set of "Twelve Pianoforte Pieces" will doubtless conduce to their author's name becoming more widely known than even it is at present, for they are eminently suitable for home use. They are severally named Rhapsodie, Meditation, Phantasy, Scherzo, Nocturne, Legend, Preghiera,

Home is home, however lowly.

Mazurka, Intermezzo, Serenade, Caprice, and Romance, which titles indicate their respective characters. The most attractive, perhaps, are the Meditation, Scherzo, Legend, and Mazurka, but each possesses considerable individuality, and they are a series of short, brilliant, and moderately difficult pieces that will form a valuable addition to the repertory of any pianist.

Song Flowers from "A Child's Garden of Verses." By Robert Louis Stevenson. Set to music by Katherine M. Ramsay. With illustrations by Gordon Browne. [Gardner, Darton and Co.]

Verses, music, and sketches are here happily united in making this dainty volume one of the most delightful gift-books of the season. Robert Louis Stevenson's bairnie poems, like good wine, need no bush. To set them to appropriate music, such as will reflect their charming naïveté, is no easy task; but we are bound to say that the fair composer has admirably succeeded in catching the spirit of Stevenson's graceful lines. Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are excellent and Mr. S. R. Crockett, a distinguished fellow-countryman of Stevenson's, contributes a characteristic foreword.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The local musical season is now in full swing, and practically began with Messrs. Harrison's first subscription concert of a series of four. The principal attraction was centred in the re-appearance of Madame Melba after an absence of four years. The Australian prima donna was in excellent voice and she could not have chosen a finer aria than "Ardon gl' incensi," the mad scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," in order to display to the fullest her beautiful voice and marvellous vocalisation. The other artists were Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Douglas Powell, Miss Llewela Davies (pianoforte), Mr. Gorski (violin), Mr. Frederic Griffith (flute), and Mr. Landon Ronald (accompanist).

Mr. J. W. Turner and his English Opera Company paid a flying visit to the Grand Theatre and produced, for the first time here, a new tragic opera in two acts, entitled "La Gitana," written by F. Leslie Morton, music by Stephen R. Philpot.

Orchestral concerts are prominently to the fore this season, their number being increased by a series of ten organised by Mr. George Halford, an earnest and accomplished musician. The first of the series was given on the 2nd ult., proving an artistic success in every way. His orchestra consists of eighty performers, with Mr. Schiever and Mr. Fred. Ward as principal first violins. For the initial concert the programme included the following: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Wagner's overture "Der Fliegende Holländer," the entrance of the gods into Valhalla, from "Rheingold"; Gounod's ballet music from "Polyeucte," and Tschaïkowsky's "Marche Slave." Madame Brema was the vocalist. The second concert took place on the 16th ult., when Mr. Emile Sauret, the eminent violinist, played Saint-Säens's Concerto (No. 3) in B minor, with the orchestra, and Ernst's "Hungarian Airs." The pieces for the orchestra consisted of Marschner's overture "Hans Heiling," Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice," and Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society opened its series of subscription concerts with Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," which attracted a large audience to the Town Hall on the 13th ult. The Society could not have marked the fiftieth anniversary of Mendelssohn's death in a more befitting manner, for it was in this very hall that in 1837 Mendelssohn conducted his great work. The last performance by this Society was in 1891, its revival was, therefore, more than justified. I cannot recall a more impressive and all-round excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's chef d'œuvre. The singing of the chorus was quite remarkable in tone power, and it was evident that the high pitch was to their liking, the intonation being absolutely pure and correct. Mr. Perkins, the organist, had to transpose the organ part a semitone higher, which he did in a faultless manner. The principals, Madame Emily Squire, Miss Marie Hooton, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies gave an intelligent and sympathetic reading of their respective parts, and to Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap fell the honour of having conducted and prepared one of the finest performances of "St. Paul" that has been heard here since the festival of 1864.

The Birmingham Amateur Orchestral Society gave an interesting concert in the large Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute, under Mr. George Halford's able conductorship. The feature of the concert centred in the first performance here of Mr. Albert W. Ketelbèy's Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, with the composer at the pianoforte, and Mr. Herbert Grice's masterly playing of Goltermann's Concerto in A minor (Op. 14) for violoncello, accompanied by the orchestra.

Mr. Stockley having last season given up his long established orchestral concerts is succeeded by Dr. Rowland Winn, who is carrying them on on somewhat the same lines as heretofore. The first of a series of four was given in the Town Hall, on the 17th ult., before a large audience. Mons. de Greef, the eminent Belgian pianist, and Madame Blanche Marchesi, vocalist, comprised the solo artists.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A splendid performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given by the Bristol Choral Society on the 6th ult. The work was well rehearsed, under the guidance of Mr. Riseley, and the result was a performance which for expression, phrasing, pronunciation of the words, and dramatic treatment approached very near to perfection. The chief vocalists were Mr. Andrew Black (who gave an admirable exposition of the part of the Prophet), Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss Sarah Berry, and Mr. Braxton Smith. Miss F. Cromey, Madame Probert-Goodwin, Miss C. Aldersley, Mrs. A. Baker, Mr. Fancourt, and Mr. W. Thomas assisted in the double quartet. The part of the Youth was taken by Master F. Gardner, formerly a chorister of Bristol Cathedral. A better representation of Mendelssohn's masterpiece has probably never been given in our city.

A pianoforte recital, on the 17th ult., by Mr. Eugene d'Albert, and several organ recitals in churches and public institutions, are the other chief musical events of the month.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. Robert Dwyer's first annual concert, which took place at the Rotunda on October 27, was the opening event of the Dublin musical season. The works presented were Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and "Loreley," with the "Magic Flute" Overture and a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were Misses Prendergast and Corcoran, Messrs. Melfort Dalton and Lawrence Mooney.

On the 3rd ult. the Dublin Musical Society gave the third of its series of orchestral concerts at the Royal University, Earlsfort Terrace. The orchestral numbers included the overtures "Der Fliegende Höllander" (Wagner) and "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn), Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, Wagner's "Walkürenritt," and Augusta Holmès's Poème Symphonique "Irlande." Songs were contributed by Miss Alice Lamb and Mr. Melfort Dalton, but undoubtedly the leading feature of the concert was Signor Esposito's masterly performance of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, in which the gifted pianist revelled in the opportunities afforded him for the display of his fine technique and graceful phrasing. In this work too the band was at its best. Dr. Joseph Smith conducted with his usual ability, and the strings were led by Mr. Arthur Darley.

The winter series of chamber music recitals, under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society, opened in the Society's new lecture theatre, Kildare Street, on Monday, the 8th ult. The executants engaged are Signor Papini, Mr. Arthur Darley, Mr. Grisard, Herr Bast, and Signor Esposito.

A violin recital was given in the concert hall of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, on the 15th ult., by Signor Gerolamo de Angelis, who has been recently appointed senior professor of the violin to the Academy. The new professor played, with Signor Esposito, Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3) for pianoforte and violin, and, with Mr. C. W. Wilson as accompanist, Tartini's Sonata in G and two of his own compositions, "Rêve d'Amour" and "Giga"; Mr. E. Gordon Cleather contributed two songs by Esposito and four by Grieg.

Two important announcements were too late for detailed notice in the present issue—namely, the Dublin Musical Society's first concert for the season, on the 25th ult., including Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," and the opening of the new Lyric Hall, Burgh Quay, with two concerts, on the 26th and 27th ult. Mr. Charles Kelly's annual concert was also announced for the 27th ult.

The new Town Hall, Rathmines, was opened, on the 20th ult., with a concert and costume performance by Madame Jeanie Rosse's Ladies' Choral Society; and Mr. Raymond Revelle will conduct a performance of "The Messiah," at the same hall, on the 1st inst., with band and chorus of 150 performers.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

Mr. H. F. Howlett's Working Girls' Orchestral Band gave a concert in the Agricultural Hall Assembly Room, Norwich, on the 8th ult., to a large number of visitors. Considering the material with which Mr. Howlett has to deal, the musical result merits high commendation and his efforts deserve every assistance from the public.

The winter season of the Saturday evening organ recitals in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, conducted by Dr. Bunnett, opened on the 6th ult., in the presence of the Mayor accompanied by members of the Corporation and a very large general audience. As usual, Dr. Bunnett's solos were finished performances, while vocal excerpts were contributed in capital style by Miss Evelyn Ray and Mr. Mandeno Jackson.

The funds of the local Asylum for the Blind must have benefited considerably by the concert given in its behalf at St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on the 14th ult., for a large audience was present. With the exception of Madame Alice Gomez, the artists engaged in the good work were local, and included Miss Evelyn Ray, Miss May Sieber, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. Charles Copeman as vocalists; while the instrumental department was ably represented by Dr. Bunnett, Mr. Kingston Rudd, Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, and Mr. R. Price. Not the least interesting pieces were several part-songs sung in capital style by inmates of the Institution.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH AND PERTH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Mr. d'Albert's recital was given too late in October for notice in last month's Musical Times, but it would be wrong to omit all mention of such an interesting event in our musical year. Some of the "Appassionata" and the Chopin and Liszt compositions were played with all possible artistic insight and power.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company presented Hamish MacCunn's new opera "Diarmid," for the first time in the provinces, on the 6th ult. The opera was repeated on the 11th and 13th ult.

The first of the University concerts arranged by the Reid Professor of Music was given on the 17th ult. As the first two concerts cover the same ground, it will be sufficient this month to record the works performed by the St. Mary's Cathedral choir, under Mr. Collinson, on the 17th ult.: anthems by Christopher Tye, Thomas Tallis (Nunc dimittis, "Come, Holy Ghost," "If ye love Me"), Farrant, Byrd ("Bow thine ear"), Merbecke, Orlando Gibbons (Nunc dimittis, "Hosanna"), William Child, Pelham Humfrey ("Hear, O Heavens"), Blow, Croft ("God is gone up"), and Maurice Greene.

A Dedication Festival was held in St. Mary's Cathedral, on the 6th ult., when the Hope-Jones action attached to the beautiful Willis organ was formally inaugurated. This handsome gift of the Precentor, the Rev. A. Griffiths, was handed over to the Cathedral in the presence of a large congregation, and the united choirs of the Cathedral, assisted by those of St. Peter's, Christ Church, St. James's, and Dalkeith Chapel, under the direction of Mr. T. H. Collinson, organist of the Cathedral, sang Dykes's "These are they" and Sir George Martin's Jubilee Te Deum. The Service was Dykes in F.

On the 17th ult. Miss Steele's choir gave a concert in the City Hall, Perth, at which Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Elkan Kosman, and Mr. Philip Halstead appeared. The well-balanced choir sang madrigals, part-songs, and glees by Morley, Mendelssohn, Pearsall, and one by Stephen Richardson, the talented organist of St. Ninian's.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

Mr. Eugene d'Albert's recital, on the evening of October 28, served once more to show his brilliant position in the ranks of pianists. Alike in his reading of the "Waldstein" Sonata and in his exposition of Chopin, our townsman, as we may justly term him, excelled beyond comparison any pianist now before the public. Glasgow did not, unfortunately, rise to the occasion; but if the audience was not what it should have been, the enthusiasm evoked during the evening was something to be remembered. On the 3rd ult. Madame Melba attracted a very large audience to St. Andrew's Hall. She was supported by Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Douglas Powell, and the favorite prima donna had a hearty reception.

"Ladies' Night" at the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club is undoubtedly one of the most popular functions in our local musical life, and on the 11th ult. the large hall in the Queen's Rooms was, according to use and wont, filled with a fashionable audience. The "Gleemen" had devised an excellent programme for the occasion, and, as usual, the pianissimo singing of the well-balanced choir was a feature of outstanding interest. Genée's "Italian Salad," that most exhilarating jest, found a welcome place in the programme, so, also, Cruickshank's "Stars of the summer night" and Cooke's glee "Fill me, boy, as deep a draught." Councillor George Taggart made his first appearance as the club's conductor, in succession to the late Mr. Allan W. Young, whose lamented death is a distinct loss to musical and journalistic circles. Mr. Taggart must be felicitated on his success, and, as usual, the pianoforte accompaniments were well cared for by Mr. J. Crossland Hirst.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company opened a fortnight's engagement at the Theatre Royal on the 15th ult. The only novelty brought out was Mr. Hamish MacCunn's "Diarmid." The new opera was very well mounted, the principals included Misses Lorraine and Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Brozél, Mr. Maggi, and Mr. Charles Tilbury; the ballet comprised several members of the Covent Garden troupe, and Mr. Richard Eckhold conducted.

The choral and orchestral concert season was announced to commence on the 30th ult., with Berlioz's "Faust," supported by the Glasgow Choral Union, Miss Jenny Taggart, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Walter Harvey, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

The first serious choral effort of the Philharmonic Society, on the 9th ult., found the "practicals" (this term, as applied to the choristers, is a historic one in Liverpool) to be in excellent form, and an adequate interpretation of Elgar's "King Olaf" was the result. The work itself is among the best things of its order which later years have seen, and its composer was heartily applauded when brought forward by Mr. Cowen, who conducted, at the close of the cantata. A miscellaneous programme was announced for the concert of the 23rd ult.

The Musical Society performed Handel's "Joshua" at the first concert of the season, on the 16th ult., and Mr. D. O. Parry is to be congratulated upon the work of his chorus. The only other kindred event of the past month has been a hearing of Mendelssohn's "Athalie," at the College of Music, on the 11th ult., when this noble work received a very fair measure of justice at the hands of the students' choir and orchestra, for which departments Messrs. Argent and Courvoisier are responsible.

Orchestral music has been, according to long standing precedent, to the front during the past month or immediately prior thereto. The 112th concert of the Società Armonica fell on October 29, and again showed how excellently this time-honoured institution is returning to the traditions which won it a premier position half-a-century ago. Upon this revival the present committee and the conductor, Mr. V. V. Akeroyd, are alike to be congratulated. On the 4th ult. a symphony concert was given at the College of Music. Of a similar character was that of the Sunday Society in St. George's Hall, on the 7th ult. The palm of all such efforts must go once more to the delightful evening spent with Mr. Rodewald and the Orchestral Society, on the 13th ult., when Beethoven's Symphony (No. 4) in B flat and a suite of Gluck's ballet music (orchestrated by Mottl) were included in the programme. So also were Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto, most cleverly played by Mr. Akeroyd, and baritone songs admirably sung by Mr. F. W. Austin.

Chamber music has been represented by Messrs. J. and F. Weingartner, and Mr. Theodore Lawson's happily constituted quartet—which excellent organisation should be destined to take a leading place in local art societies—and last, not least, by Messrs. Grieg and Wolff.

At Warrington, Mr. Crossley's Society announced Mendelssohn's "Elijah" for the 17th ult.; at Runcorn, where Mr. Bantock has succeeded to the conductorship of the amalgamated choristers, a concert has been given with much success; and at Southport, Mr. Hudson has treated his patrons to a fair performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend."

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

An additional interest was given to the first of Mr. Brodsky's recitals by the introduction of a MS. Sonata for violin and pianoforte by Mr. Dayas, the pianist for the evening and one of the professors at the Royal College here. The work is far too ambitious and complicated for any fair and adequate judgment to be possible after a single hearing; but it is essentially modern in style, and it was warmly received, in spite of its great length and elaboration. Mr. Brodsky and the composer interpreted with the utmost care the sonata, which intervened between the sensuous simplicity of a Mozart and the greater depth of a Beethoven quartet. Both of the executants had further reason to be gratified by the evidence of earnest work which their students at the College gave at the open practice of the 12th ult. There was much that was positively good, and nothing weak or unpromising; while, in the vocal department, Mrs. Hutchinson's pupils excited increased hope. It is understood that organ solos are withheld only until the completion of the new instrument which is, after Christmas, to take the place of the "kist o' whistles" now on the platform of the pretty little saloon of the Institution. The Brahms Sextet in G (Op. 36), which Mr. Brodsky produced on the 17th ult., is throughout a very interesting, although an unequal work. The opening movement is astonishingly charming and fresh, and as full of melody as well as clear in design as anything Brahms has left us; but the after-sections, although there are many beauties scattered through them, scarcely show a like spontaneity and definiteness of purpose. Between the Sextet and the wild and patchy Quartet in G minor (Op. 27) of Grieg, Beethoven's great Pianoforte Trio (Op. 70) was most delightfully played by Messrs. Brodsky and Fuchs, in conjunction with Signor Busoni, who appeared in Manchester for the first time and was, unhappily, prompted by the warmth of his reception to add a solo—the second and third movements of the "Waldstein" Sonata—the Intermezzo being played with consummate taste and expression, but the Rondo with a frantic exaggeration hateful to all lovers of Beethoven's beautiful work.

The first of the subscription concerts which Messrs. Hime and Addison give in conjunction with Messrs. Harrison was very largely attended, although Madame Patti, this season, did not favour us. Madame Melba was the chief attraction, and she was most ably supported by Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Douglas Powell, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Gorski, Miss Llewella Davies, and Mr. F. Griffith.

The fourth of our Thursday evenings was devoted to Haydn's "Creation," the honours of the performance being carried off by Mr. R. H. Wilson's choir. But how strangely overlooked was the fiftieth anniversary of Mendelssohn's death, when the "Elijah" would have had a special and solemn interest. Upon the purely orchestral performances of the other evenings nothing but commendation could be bestowed. The wisdom of Mr. Cowen's appointment as the director of the Manchester orchestra has been abundantly and repeatedly proved. Not only was the selection recommended by the whole of the band, after experience of many able conductors who kindly undertook to assist us during our embarrassment, and warmly applauded by all discriminating frequenters of the concerts; but now, in place of the murmurs of disappointment which were wrung from some of the friends of other aspirants, there is even some danger of a too violent reaction. In the arrangement of his programmes, as well as in the excellence of their rendering, Mr. Cowen deserves praise; but Tschaïkowsky was a most unequal writer; and, although the public may be eager to know more about the author of the "Pathetic" Symphony, still it is clear that many of his works, however cleverly scored, might be suffered to slumber, as may the "Harold in Italy" medley of Berlioz, notwithstanding the able executancy by Mr. Speelman of the solo which represents only too faithfully the weak and incoherent state of mind of the hero as he idly wandered among the mountains. The Concerto (No. 2) of Saint-Saëns and sundry smaller after-pieces afforded Mr. Slivinski ample opportunity for the display of great brilliancy of finger action, and, in the Scherzo of the larger work, a delightful delicacy of touch and appreciation.

The second and fourth programmes of the Hallé concerts I must couple together, both of them being devoted to Wagner selections, the former enlivened by Mr. Andrew Black and the latter by the same gentleman and Madame Brema. On both occasions the hall was densely crowded, consequently the business-like prudence of the arrangement was attested in the most convincing manner possible, and the interpretation of every piece was beyond criticism. Nevertheless, long selections of fragments, however individually choice, are apt to become wearisome, especially when all come from the same pen, and particularly from a pen so prone to run in one groove as was that of Wagner. I must not omit to mention that additional interest is imparted to the programmes by the excellent analytical notes provided by Mr. E. F. Jacques.

Mr. G. W. Lane's concert of the 20th ult. was completely successful, the singing of the very large choir showing decided improvement, especially in Pinsuti's part-song "The sea hath its pearls." The tone of the contraltos was slightly hard and unsympathetic, but in each section there was greater firmness of attack than of old, as well as such increased resonance as showed that some of the less useful members of the early days of the Philharmonic Choir had retired. In addition to Bruno Steindel—the latest of those precocious young pianists who, of late, have been allowed to appear on concert platforms instead of being restricted to the drawing-room for the entertaining of their cousins and their aunts—the efforts of the ever popular Meister Glee Singers served to cheer the spirits of the crowded audience after depression by somewhat doleful songs by Mrs. Mary Davies and Miss Ada Crossley. But still more interest was felt in the recital, by the "Burgon Opera Company," of Miss Lehmann's song cycle "In a Persian Garden," a series of brief vocal sketches for soli and quartet, with pianoforte accompaniment admirably played by Mr. Leslie Smith, radiant with fresh and pleasant melodies and some dramatic writing, a truly admirable work for a small but refined choir with four accomplished amateur soloists.

Mr. Max Mayer has long been known in Manchester as a most earnest and successful pianoforte teacher, endowed with artistic instincts, and his annual series of recitals has, for the last eight years, tended to keep alive and to spread a taste for the highest class of chamber music. Happily, the number of earnest students, capable of appreciating such developed works as appeal to us without the high colouring of varied orchestral tone, is rapidly increasing; and it was most encouraging to note the close and absorbed attention bestowed upon such serious compositions as Beethoven's G minor Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, Brahms's (Op. 100) in A major for pianoforte and violin, and the Gernsheim Trio in B major, as admirably played by Mr. Mayer in conjunction with Mr. Brodsky and Mr. Carl Fuchs.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

On the 4th ult. the Sunderland Philharmonic Society inaugurated its thirty-eighth season by a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," in the Victoria Hall, Sunderland. The principal vocalists were Madame Marie Duma, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Dan Price, all of whom were eminently successful. It is many years since this popular work was last heard in Sunderland, but the evident appreciation with which it was received by a large audience will probably lead to the revival of other standard works which have of recent years been somewhat neglected in this locality. The band and chorus on this occasion numbered about 200 performers. The choruses were exceedingly well sung and the whole performance reflected much credit upon the conductor, Mr. N. Kilburn.

The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union gave its first concert of the season in the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 16th ult. The work selected for the occasion was Haydn's "Creation," and the soloists engaged were Madame Zipporah Monteith, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle. The principal feature of the performance was the admirable singing of the large chorus of about 350 voices, undoubtedly at present the finest choir in these counties. The orchestra was fully equal to the demands made upon it. Mr. James M. Preston conducted and Mr. T. Wilkinson presided at the organ.

The Newcastle Chamber Music Society opened its season, on the 25th ult., with a concert in the Assembly Rooms, Newcastle. The programme included string quartets by Beethoven (in E minor, Op. 59, No. 2) and Schumann (in A minor, Op. 41, No. 1), played by Messrs. Willy Hess, Willy Seibert, Josef Schwartz, and Friedrich Grützmacher. The vocalist was Miss Kate Cherry, and Mr. James M. Preston presided at the pianoforte.

The Sunderland Chamber Music Society gave its first concert of the season on the 23rd ult. Beethoven's Trio for pianoforte and strings (Op. 1, No. 1) was played by Mr. Petersson, Miss Gertrude Smith, and Mr. Oscar Cohen. Mr. Petersson also played a Tarantelle by Schubert and two movements of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and Miss Smith gave an excellent performance of Goltermann's Concerto for violoncello in A minor (Op. 14).

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Sacred Harmonic Society commenced its series of concerts with a fine performance of Berlioz's "Faust," on the 10th ult. The Hallé orchestra was engaged and Mr. F. H. Cowen conducted the concert. The principal rôles were undertaken by Miss Helen Jaxon, Messrs. Watkin Mills, Lloyd Chandos, and Ford Waltham. With one small exception the chorus acquitted itself well, and did credit to the painstaking preparation it had undergone with Mr. H. A. Branscombe, of Liverpool, who had undertaken the rehearsals in the absence of a regular conductor. The attendance, though large, did not redound to the credit of the musical public, who ought to support the Society better in its determination to give choral concerts in the best possible manner.

On Tuesday, the 16th ult., Mr. Henry J. Wood commenced his duties as conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society, being felicitously introduced by the president, Sir S. G. Johnson. The chorus must be congratulated on his appointment.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Rotherham Choral Society performed "Elijah," in the Drill Hall, on the 11th ult. Under Mr. T. Brameld's direction a distinct success was obtained, the singing of the chorus marking an advance on the Society's previous efforts. The principals were Miss Jessie Moorhouse, Miss Alice Burkenshaw, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. John Browning. Under the leadership of Mr. John Peck, an excellent orchestra played the accompaniments in capable style.

A considerable selection from "Elijah" was given by the Burngreave Choral Society on the 15th ult., under Mr. H. C. Jackson.

The first of a series of four subscription concerts, organised by Miss M. Foxon, was given in the Cutlers' Hall, Sheffield, on the 16th ult. The vocalist was Miss Marie Brema, who sang songs by Beethoven, Schubert, Franz, Grieg, and M. V. White. The instrumentalists were Messrs. Brodsky, Rawdon Briggs, S. Speelman, and Carl Fuchs. Quartets by Beethoven and Grieg were played, and Messrs. Brodsky and Fuchs contributed solos. Mr. S. Liddle was accompanist.

Dr. Coward is giving an interesting series of University Extension Lectures, at Firth College, on musical history, &c.

A project is on foot to place some memorial to the late Mr. T. Tallis Trimnell in the Parish Church, Sheffield, of which church he was for many years the organist and choirmaster.

The Musical Union performed Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" in the Albert Hall, on the 18th ult., under Dr. Coward's direction. The cantata was adequately rendered, excellent results being obtained by both chorus and orchestra. The principals were Miss Jessie Moorhouse, Mrs. Charge, and Mr. Tom Child. Mr. J. H. Parkes led the band and Mr. W. S. Jessop was organist.

The Sheffield Choral Union performed the third Acts from "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser" at the first concert, on the 23rd ult. Miss Ghita Corri, Mr. Hirwen Thomas, and Mr. Charles Clark were the principals. Mr. J. H. Parkes led the band and Mr. S. Suckley conducted.

The Hallé Orchestra and Mr. F. H. Cowen visited Sheffield on the 26th ult., and performed a programme consisting entirely of Wagner's compositions. Mr. Douglas Powell was the vocalist.

"The Woman of Samaria" was performed at Attercliffe on the 29th ult. Mr. W. W. Chisholm conducted, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers was organist.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

At Bournemouth, Mr. Dan Godfrey, Jun., has made a splendid beginning to what promises to be an exceptionally interesting season. Large audiences are the rule at the Symphony Concerts, which take place in the Pavilion on Monday and Thursday afternoons, and the work done by the municipal orchestra is worthy of the highest praise. Fine performances of symphonies and other important works by Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Dvorák, Saint-Saëns, and other masters give unmistakable evidence of Mr. Godfrey's skill as a conductor and of the capabilities of the players under his control. The fact that the scheme of these concerts includes neither vocal solos nor what are called "popular pieces" makes their success the more notable and the more gratifying.

At the special Saturday afternoon concerts the Meister Glee Singers, with Mrs. Helen Trust, Madame Frickenhaus, and Mons. Hollman, on the 6th ult., and Madame Albani, supported by a strong party, which included Miss Fanny Davies, Miss Maud MacCarthy, and Mr. Lemprière Pringle, on the 13th ult., proved powerful attractions.

Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and, of course, "The Messiah" are mentioned as the principal choral works to be performed at the next Bournemouth musical festival, which it is proposed to hold in the spring of 1898.

The newly formed Boscombe Musical Society (conductor, Mr. George) is already at work upon Handel's "Samson" and Cowen's "Rose Maiden."

Mr. Alfred Foley arranged a good programme for his concert at the County Hall, Salisbury, on the 16th ult. The Salisbury Philharmonic Society, which, under the careful direction of Mr. Foley, has reached a high state of efficiency, sang Mendelssohn's "O come, let us worship," Gade's "Spring's Message," and Eaton Faning's "Daybreak," besides a number of part-songs; and the orchestra, augmented for the occasion by several members of the Royal Marine Light Infantry band, played, among other numbers, a new work by Marie Moody, "Schlummerlied and Serenade." Miss Maud Robertson and the Meister Glee Singers were also engaged to appear.

Under the conductorship of Mr. Leonard Ellis, Barnby's sacred idyll "Rebekah" was given in St. Paul's Church, Southampton, on Sunday, the 14th ult., and in St. Mary's Church on the 18th ult. The solo vocalists on each occasion were Miss Rose Parminter, Mr. G. Conlan, and Mr. Geddes, the organ accompaniments being supplied by Mr. R. Sharpe.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

The event of the past month's music in Leeds which promises to be of the most lasting and vital importance was the first appearance of Dr. Stanford in the capacity of conductor of the Leeds Philharmonic Society. This was on October 27, when Parts I. and II. of the "Creation" and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht" were performed. The chorus had been well trained by the newly appointed choirmaster of the Society, Mr. F. K. Hattersley, and the band did better than usual, though there was one disastrous slip on the part of the first clarinet. The principals were Madame Esty, Miss Enid Grimshaw, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Andrew Black. On the preceding evening the Messrs. Haddock began their season of popular musical evenings, and on the 13th ult. inaugurated a new venture, a series of afternoon concerts, at which nothing but contemporary British music is to be heard. Mr. Algernon Ashton was the first composer to supply a programme, and his musicianship and diligence were shown in a series of instrumental and vocal pieces, in which he was assisted by Mr. Edgar Haddock (violin), Mr. Arthur Ayres (pianoforte), and a vocal quartet. His pianoforte music was quite the most successful feature of the concert, showing sympathy with the instrument and some melodic resource. On the 3rd ult. the Leeds Choral Union gave at its first concert a more than creditable performance of Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," not so strong on its dramatic side—with the sole exception of Madame Brema's well-known impersonation of the heroine—as in the direction of the good chorus-singing, which showed Mr. Alfred Benton's ability as a choir-trainer. The other principal soloists were Mr. Herbert Grover, Mr. William Thornton, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Two interesting concerts of chamber music in Leeds remain to be noticed. On the 1st ult. Miss Alice Simpkin gave an enjoyable violin recital, and played pieces by Bach, Vieuxtemps, Lalo, and Svendsen in thoroughly artistic style. She was assisted by Mr. Jules Holländer as pianist and Mr. Browning as vocalist. The other concert was the first of some quartet evenings, organised by Mr. Rawdon Briggs, of the Hallé orchestra, and Miss Eisele, a local pianist. Brahms's Quintet in F minor and a Haydn Quartet in D minor (Op. 76, No. 2) formed the backbone of the programme, which was eked out by pianoforte pieces and a quartet movement by Schubert. Messrs. Bridge, Holme, and Hatton were the other members of the party.

At Bradford the very successful subscription concerts began their thirty-third season, on the 22nd ult., with a visit from the Richter orchestra. The programme was of the type familiar to those who attend "Richter Concerts." The second concert, on the 19th ult., was of a miscellaneous kind, Madame Albani and Miss Clara Butt being the popular attractions. Miss Fanny Davies and Mr. Hausmann were the instrumentalists, and gave an artistic tone to the programme. The Festival Choral Society gave evidence of the fresh life that has been imparted to it by its new conductor, Mr. Cowen, at its concert on the 5th ult. The composer's Gloucester cantata, "The Transfiguration," took up the first part, and the second was given to Mr. Elgar's "King Olaf." Fair justice was done to both, but Mr. Elgar's elaborate score demands more than a portion of the single full rehearsal which is all that could be allotted to it. Its power, freshness, and wealth of ideas were, however, shown beyond possibility of contradiction, and there can be no doubt that the work will make its way wherever it is heard. The principals were Madame Henson, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. William Green, and the indispensable and ubiquitous Mr. Black. On the 16th ult. the Bradford Old Choral Society celebrated in advance the centenary of the "Creation" by a very creditable performance of that oratorio, under Mr. Robertshaw's conductorship. The solo parts were efficiently taken by Miss Alice Simons, Mr. J. Dean Trotter, and Mr. Charles Phillips. On the same date the Messrs. Oppenheim gave one of the "Harmony" concerts of chamber music at Bradford. Pianoforte and violin music, and songs by Mrs. C. L. Atkinson, formed an interesting programme.

At Huddersfield there have been two more subscription concerts, on October 26 and the 9th ult. Madame Melba's brilliant vocalisation was the attraction on the former occasion, while at the latter Mr. d'Albert appeared, with Madame Sethe as violinist and Mr. Plunket Greene as vocalist. On the 19th ult. the Halifax Choral Society gave an exceptionally good concert. The engagement of the Hallé band made it possible not only to give finished performances of Brahms's "Schicksalslied" and—as a delicate compliment to the conductor of the concert—Mr. Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," but also to introduce to Halifax the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaïkowsky, with which Mr. Cowen has taken great pains. The principals were Miss Teresa Blamy, Miss Florence Oliver, Mr. Herbert Grover, and Mr. Charles Copland. The chorus-singing was remarkably polished, and the care with which every nuance was observed in the "Schicksalslied" reflected the highest credit upon the Society's new conductor, Mr. T. Smith.

The very enterprising Dewsbury Choral Society, which has shown a healthy preference for the best contemporary English composers, gave its second performance of Dr. Parry's "Judith," on the 2nd ult. By an unfortunate mischance no clarinet part turned up, besides which the band was not quite so strongly manned as on the former occasion. But the chorus sang well, and, generally speaking, the performance, under Mr. Hirst's direction, was of high merit. The solos were taken by Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Dews, Mr. W. Green, and Mr. J. Browning. The neighbouring Society at Morley, of which Mr. Alfred Benton is conductor, gave a concert on the 10th ult., the programme of which was only of moderate interest, Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" and Mendelssohn's "Loreley" Finale being its chief features. Miss Ruby Shaw, Mr. Brearley, and Mr. Billington were the principals.

The seventh season of the Wakefield chamber concerts began on the 18th ult., when Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Jasper Sutcliffe, and Mr. H. Walenn played an early Beethoven trio. Mr. Kennerley Rumford sang several modern Lieder.

On the 12th ult. the Hull Harmonic Society was visited by Dr. Hubert Parry, who conducted his oratorio "Job," together with a number of his shorter works, including the charming Suite in F, originally written for strings alone, but with wind parts added at a later date. The chorus, carefully trained by their regular conductor, Mr. Walter Porter, showed a thorough familiarity with their work, and the principals, Miss Hilda Foster, Mr. Branscombe, Mr. Waddington, and Mr. Andrew Black, were highly satisfactory. The Hull Vocal Society followed suit on the 16th with a Sullivan programme, which, as might be expected, proved very attractive. In the "Golden Legend," which took up half the concert, Mr. Douglas Powell was especially successful as the Lucifer, the other parts being taken by Miss Lucile Hill, Miss Lilian Hovey, and Mr. Braxton Smith. The "Di Ballo" Overture and selections from the "Henry VIII." music were also given under Dr. Smith's direction. On the 10th ult. a chamber concert was given in York, Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet, which was the chief feature, being played by Miss Bigge (pianoforte), Miss Nora Clench (violin), Miss Knocker (viola), and Canon Hudson (violoncello). The vocalists were Miss M. Barter and Mr. F. Harford. Cowen's "St. John's Eve" was given by the Ripon Choral Society, on the 16th ult., Miss Beecroft, Mrs. Heath, the Rev. W. P. Besley, and Mr. J. W. Senior being the principals, the Rev. F. H. Taylor conducting. Performances of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Brighouse Choral Society, under Mr. J. H. Pearson, and of Gounod's "Faust" at Hebden Bridge, under Mr. Eckersley, can only be barely chronicled.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

Wagner's unique comic opera "Die Meistersinger," prepared for months past with the utmost regard for its every detail, was brought out for the first time in Paris, on the 10th ult., at the Grand Opéra, with a French version in rhythmic prose by Mr. Alfred Ernst, under M. Taffanel's direction. The orchestra had been, for this special purpose, much enlarged by the addition of a number of first-rate musicians and the choristers strengthened by some eighty additional voices. The performance of the choral portions, indeed, which form so important a feature in this work, was most admirable, and M. Claudius Blanc has been unanimously praised in the organs of the press for his share in this result. As regards the leading vocal interpreters, all were deserving of praise for the zeal with which they entered upon their task and fully earned the applause bestowed upon them. They were Mesdames Bréval (Eva) and Grandjean (Magdalène), MM. Alvarez (Walther), Delmas (Hans Sachs), Renaud (Beckmesser), Vaguet (David), and Gresse (Pogner). The general mise-en-scène was irreproachable and the audience one of the largest, most brilliant, and most enthusiastic brought together here for a long time past. It was a veritable triumph for the work of the Bayreuth master and reflected much credit upon the directors of the Académie Nationale.

There will be a revival of "Thaïs" shortly at the Opéra, and also, later on, of "Le Prophète," in which Mdlle. Delna will appear for the first time in the principal female part. At the Opéra Comique, M. Massenet's "Sapho" is in active preparation, and will be brought out before long.

The assumption of the direction of the Lamoureux Concerts by that eminent conductor's son-in-law, M. Chevillard, naturally aroused a great deal of interest in musical quarters. Let it be said at once that he proved himself, in the first concert conducted by him, a chef d'orchestre of the first rank. His success, indeed, was complete, and he was the recipient of a perfect ovation on the part of his audience, while, at the same time, it must not be forgotten that the magnificent orchestra directed by him had been trained by M. Lamoureux. M. Chevillard is an excellent pianist, a talented composer, and is, moreover, in possession of all the traditions emanating from M. Lamoureux. At the same time, his conducting exhibited some merits entirely his own, and he seemed to infuse a measure of rejuvenescent vigour into an orchestra so long accustomed to the peculiarities of one and the same conductor, however excellent.

At the Colonne concert of October 24 there was a first hearing of an orchestral piece entitled "Nuit d'amour bergamasque," by M. Reynaldo Hahn, a work replete with interesting detail in its orchestration, but somewhat rhapsodical in style. M. Raoul Pugno, who was the pianist on the occasion, played the "Variations Symphoniques," by César Franck, with enormous success. At the concert of October 31, Señor Sarasate made his first appearance this season, and was immensely applauded in his interpretation of the Concerto in B minor by Saint-Saëns. The eminent violinist again appeared in the succeeding concert of the 7th ult., in which Mdlle. Tanési also interpreted fragments from "Iphigénie en Tauride." The Thursday afternoon concerts recently instituted by M. Colonne, the programmes of which embrace the works of both the old and modern masters, have so far proved very successful.

The band of the Russian Preobrojensky Regiment, comprising sixty-seven instrumentalists, under the direction of M. Friedman, has lately arrived in Paris and is giving a series of concerts here. Needless to add that these excellent musicians are accorded a most hearty reception.

The libel action taken by Mr. Charles Fry, the well-known reciter, against Mr. J. F. Runciman, the musical critic of the Saturday Review, for a libel which appeared in the Magazine of Music, was heard in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, on the 2nd ult., before Mr. Justice Lawrance and a special jury. Mr. Cock, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C. (instructed by Messrs. Calkin, Lewis and Stokes), appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Kershaw, Q.C., and Mr. C. A. H. Black (instructed by Messrs. Clinton) for the defendant. Sir Alexander Mackenzie and Mr. Joseph Bennett gave evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, and stated that the libel in question could only refer to the plaintiff, as he was the original reciter of the "Dream of Jubal," and the only elocutionist who had "gone about" reciting in that work. Mr. J. W. Coates, the editor and proprietor of the Magazine of Music, said that an action had in the first case been brought against him by the plaintiff, but upon his apologising and paying £20 into Court the action had been withdrawn on condition of his giving up the name of the writer, who was the defendant in this action. For the defence Mr. Runciman was called, and swore that he did not write the portion of the article referred to, and had not seen the proofs. A letter, however, was produced, written by him to Mr. Coates, stating that he just "rushed through the December proofs"—the number in question. Being pressed to produce the notes of the article referred to dictated by the defendant to his shorthand writer, Bell, the defendant was unable to do so, and a letter was read from the defendant to Bell in which he said "I must keep them until they have served their purpose and then I shall burn them." The jury, without quitting the box, gave a verdict for the plaintiff, with £200 damages, and judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff with costs. The case created great interest in musical circles, and many persons eminent in the musical and journalistic professions were present in Court.

Messrs. Ross and Moore, whose ensemble pianoforte playing attracted attention some months back, have given, at St. James's Hall, two concerts specially arranged for the manifestation of their particular skill. On the 11th ult. the utmost precision and unity of effect marked their delivery of Rubinstein's "Staccato Study." In Chopin's Rondo in C, Schumann's Theme with variations, and a few other pieces, the executants also justified the reputation they have obtained. Miss Edith Robinson distinguished herself by a finished delivery of the romance from Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin, and vocal pieces were contributed by Misses Gertrude Lynes and May Pinney and Messrs. George Devoli and Edwin Isham. The second concert (18th ult.) brought an interesting feature in some waltzes arranged by Brahms thirty years ago for Frau Tausig, a manuscript copy of which she recently presented to Messrs. Ross and Moore, who, judging from the reception the piece obtained on this occasion, are likely to find it for some time one of the most attractive in their extensive répertoire. Among the other works they played with notable success was Sinding's Variations in E flat minor.

The Royal Society of Musicians gave its annual public performance at the Queen's Hall, on Friday, the 12th ult. There is no need to insist on the claims of this venerable Society for support as they are freely acknowledged. For many years "The Messiah" was given annually, probably out of respect to the memory of the great master, who interested himself greatly in the Society and bequeathed it £1,000. Latterly, however, other works have been chosen, and "Elijah" was the oratorio selected on the present occasion. The principal solo parts were taken by Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Watkin Mills as the Prophet. There was a large and highly efficient orchestra and chorus, but inasmuch as the whole of the performers gave their services gratuitously, detailed criticism is of course inadmissible. It may be said, however, in general terms, that under Mr. Randegger's vigorous direction an extremely good performance of Mendelssohn's work was secured, and as there was a crowded room we hope benefit accrued to the Society.

Preliminary examinations for eleven Free Open Scholarships at the Royal College of Music will be held on February 2, 1898, in various local centres throughout the United Kingdom. Those candidates only who may be selected at these preliminary examinations will be allowed to attend the final competition for the scholarships before the director and board of professors at the College in London on or about February 26. The scholarships will be allotted as follows: composition (1), pianoforte (2), singing (1), organ (2), violin (1), viola or double-bass (1), wind instruments (3)—flute, clarinet, and bassoon. The scholarships are of the approximate value of £40 a year each, are open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects within the prescribed ages, and are obtainable by competitive examination only. Full particulars may be obtained from the registrar, Mr. Frank Pownall, Royal College of Music, Kensington.

The Gompertz String Quartet offered an interesting programme for the commencement of another season at Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 17th ult. The combined talents of Messrs. Gompertz, Haydn Inwards, Emil Kreuz, and Charles Ould were displayed in Brahms's Quartet in C minor (Op. 51) and in Tschaïkowsky's work in F major (Op. 22), each of which demands the most careful interpretation to fully develop the manifold beauties. These pieces were given with the unanimity of feeling vouching for perfect sympathy no less than for adequate preparation. Mr. Gompertz took for violin solo a set of "Germanische Tanze," by Mr. Kreuz, who may be congratulated upon a composition as acceptable to the executant as to the listener. In his best style Mr. Plunket Greene sang pieces by Brahms, Jensen, and Somervell.

Miss Isabel MacDougall, a highly gifted mezzo-soprano, achieved a distinct success at her first vocal recital at Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 19th ult. To a rich voice and finished method she adds a command of varying styles enabling her to draw from a number of sources and to do justice to almost every piece she undertakes. On this occasion Miss MacDougall gave examples of over a dozen composers, from Caccini to popular musicians of the present time. Her delivery of each abundantly manifested the qualities essential to securing favour in the field entered upon. Her rendering of Liszt's setting of "Kennst du das Land" was particularly striking. Mr. Denis O'Sullivan and Señor Arbos afforded relief with songs and violin solos respectively, and their artistic efforts were exceedingly well received.

The Bernhard Carrodus String Quartet gave a successful concert at Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 10th ult. With the assistance of Mr. W. Richardson, Messrs. B. M., R., and J. F. Carrodus—three sons of the deceased violinist—played Beethoven's Quartet (Op. 18, No. 5), the variations from Schubert's Fourth Quartet, and Haydn's Quartet (No. 49) with balance of tone and careful regard for expression. In general smoothness the performance, indeed, left little to be desired. For solo, Mr. Bernhard Carrodus, the leader of the quartet party, neatly rendered the Rhapsodie from Mackenzie's "Pibroch," and Mr. J. F. Carrodus contributed a couple of violoncello pieces. Miss Jessie King was heard to advantage in Kjerulf's "Last Night" and Gustav Ernest's "Sleep and Rest."

"The Scarlet Feather," under which title Lecocq's comic opera "La Petite Mariée" was produced in English on the 17th ult., at the Shaftesbury Theatre, is not one of the best of its French composer's works, and much of its merriment has gone with the sundry omissions deemed advisable. Amongst the most pleasing numbers are "There once was a dear little maiden," the trio "Oh, it's certainly true," and the Finale to the first Act, in which much musicianly skill is shown. In the second Act the duet "A nightingale upon a tree" is also very pleasing. The principal parts were sustained by Miss Decima Moore, Miss Nellie Stewart, Mr. Hedmont, and Mr. Snazelle, the chorus contained some excellent voices, and the dresses were handsome and artistic.

The Mozart Society, which now seems to be fairly established, began its new season on the 13th ult., at the Portman Rooms. The programme contained Mozart's Trio in E flat for pianoforte and strings, a selection from Brahms's "Liebeslieder Walzer," and Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, the last-named being admirably interpreted by Mr. J. H. Bonawitz, the founder of the Society. Other executants were Miss Margaret Hoare, Mr. H. Montague Borwell, Madame d'Amély, Mdlle. C. A. Brousil, Mrs. Kate Bartholomew, Mr. R. W. Mitton, and Herr Kummer. The meetings will be continued on successive Saturday afternoons up to the 11th inst., and will be resumed in the new year on March 5.

Mr. H. Lane Wilson, a young baritone, who is already favourably known to many by his singing and some clever songs, gave his first vocal recital at the Steinway Hall, on the 15th ult., when he greatly increased the good impressions he had previously made. Mr. Wilson's programme embraced several schools of music, justice to each of which was done, and particularly to an attractive group of old English lyrics arranged by the singer, and which were admirably suited to his manly style. Able assistance was given by Miss Hilda Wilson, who was in excellent voice, and pleasing variety was afforded by the violin playing of Madame Beatrice Langley. Miss Eva Lonsdale accompanied with taste and skill.

Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given at All Saints' Church, Battersea Park, with full choir and orchestra, on All Saints' Day. The choruses were given with great precision and finish, and the whole of the music was listened to with the greatest interest and appreciation by a crowded congregation. The solos were taken by members of the church choir, Masters Thomas and Harold Dick and George Heath being responsible for the treble, Mr. W. G. Field and Mr. A. J. Wilson the bass, and Mr. T. Dunkerton the tenor solos. Dr. Huntley, organist of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, was the conductor, and Mr. C. J. Capponi, organist and choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ.

Dr. Walter B. Gilbert, late of Trinity Chapel, New York, has arrived in London, having sailed by the S.S. "St. Louis," reaching Southampton on the 10th ult. His departure from New York was marked by some very agreeable attentions, several members of the congregation, together with the choir, with many professional and personal friends, bidding him "Bon voyage" at the quay. After Dr. Gilbert's long and honoured service in the church, both in his native country and in New York, it might be supposed that he would be glad to retire into private life; but we understand that he is still desirous of undertaking any professional church work if the opportunity presents itself to him.

Count P. Rochaid's flute recital at Steinway Hall, on the 16th ult., was chiefly remarkable for the excellent performance by Miss Clara Asher, the pianist, of Brahms's Rhapsody in G minor, and by Mr. J. E. Hambleton of Piatti's melodious Nocturne for violoncello. These skilled players were associated in Weber's Trio for pianoforte, violoncello, and flute (Op. 63) with Count Rochaid. The last-named, who comes from Paris, seemed more at ease in the solos he had selected for the occasion, his rendering of a telling piece by Demersseman being decidedly creditable. The instrumental pieces were diversified by the agreeable singing of Miss Georgina Delmar.

"Il Piccolo Haydn," a one-act opera by Signori Antonio and Gaetano Cipollini, originally produced at the Teatro Sociale, Como, in January, 1893, was performed in English for the first time in London, on the 16th ult., at the Lyric Theatre. The music is a somewhat incongruous mixture of genuine and imitation Haydn and Mascagni phraseology. The best numbers are a minuet and the aria "Ocean, so tranquil." The parts of Haydn and Porpora were respectively sustained by Miss Marie Elba and Mr. W. H. Stephens, and the other characters were represented by Miss Marie Titiens, Madame Lennox, and Mr. A. S. Winckworth. Mr. N. Lambert was the conductor.

Mr. Charles Jacoby gave a chamber concert of much artistic interest on October 27, at St. James's Hall. The programme contained Brahms's beautiful Clarinet Quintet in B minor (Op. 115), the wind part being excellently played by Mr. Draper, and Dvorák's characteristic Quartet in E flat (Op. 51), Mr. Jacoby in both these works, as well as in his rendering of some violin solo pieces by Bach, proving himself an accomplished musician. The other string players were Messrs. M. Jacoby, Kreuz, and Whitehouse. Madame Haas contributed some pianoforte pieces by Chopin, and Miss Louise Dale sang with her usual charm and refinement.

The Orphanage for the Children of Musicians is now an accomplished fact, the Incorporated Society of Musicians having taken over the Orphan School conducted for so many years by Miss Helen Kenway, and discharged all the liabilities connected therewith. Miss Kenway has been appointed lady principal, and the children are now being supported and educated at the cost of the Society. The benefits of the Orphanage not being limited to the children of members, the Society may justly look for assistance in so good a work from all interested in music and musicians.

A series of very effective and interesting tableaux, illustrating George Eliot's "Spanish Gypsy" and Tennyson's "The Lady of Shalott," was given at the Hampstead Drill Hall on October 23, when the poems were effectively read by Mr. Mark Ambient. A special feature of the occasion was the highly appropriate music from the works of Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, and others, which was most carefully selected and deftly introduced by Mr. Arnold Kennedy, who efficiently presided at the pianoforte throughout the evening.

The following gentlemen have satisfied the examiners for the degree of Bachelor of Music at the University of Oxford: John E. Borland, Queen's and Bermondsey Settlement, London; E. J. Chadfield, non-collegiate and Derby; C. E. de M. Leathes, non-collegiate and West Dulwich; and B. F. Ramsay, Worcester College and Bournemouth. The examiners were Sir John Stainer, Magdalen College, Professor of Music; Dr. Hubert H. Parry, Exeter, Choragus; and Sir Frederick Bridge, Queen's College.

The Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah" in Christ Church, Endell Street, on October 27. The soloists were Miss A. Wilmot-Briggs, Miss Kitty Longland, Mr. Wilfred Pepper, and Mr. Edwin Webster. A second performance of the oratorio was given on the 3rd ult., in St. John's Church, Isle of Dogs. The soloists were Miss A. Wilmot-Briggs, Miss Kitty Longland, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Swabey Russell. Dr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

Mr. J. Henry Leipold appeared in the double capacity of composer and pianist at his concert at Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 22nd ult. Proof of his skill in vocal composition was afforded in the songs "The Sleeping Beauty" and "The Prince of Love," to the contrasted spirit of which Madame Kate Cove gave excellent expression. The programme also included Godard's duo Sonata for pianoforte and violin in G minor (Op. 9), played by the concert-giver and Mr. George F. Leipold.

Sir Frederick Bridge conducted a fine performance of his "Flag of England," given by the Rochester Choral Society, on the 18th ult. Madame Duma was the soloist, and the complete band and chorus gave evidence of the careful training they had received at the hands of their conductor, Mr. Greene, of Gravesend. The "Flag of England" is announced to be performed at Stratford, Southend, Sittingbourne, Leamington, Chester, and Exeter.

The members of the choir of the West London Synagogue presented to Dr. C. G. Verrinder, the conductor and organist, a handsome gold chain, in commemoration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, on the 5th ult. Baron Phillips, in making the presentation, asked Dr. Verrinder to accept the souvenir of a historical event as a companion gift to the gold watch presented to him on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee in 1887.

Mr. Henry J. Baker, conductor of the Hornsey and Crouch End Orchestral Society, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Hornsey, and principal of the Hornsey Academy of Music, has been appointed conductor and musical director at the Alexandra Palace, which will re-open on Good Friday. A large choir is now in course of formation, and the musical arrangements are being rapidly pushed forward.

Mr. Frederic Lamond, at a recital recently given by him at Frankfort-on-Main, played with immense success the Sonatas, Op. 106, 111, 110, followed by those of Op. 53 and 57, by Beethoven, and repeated the performance on the 13th ult. at the Leipzig Gewandhaus. The appreciation which the Scottish pianist met with at the latter place was so pronounced that he will return in January for two recitals of Brahms's works.

The first performance in Germany of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's oratorio "Ruth" took place in Berlin on the 22nd ult. It was given by the Cäcilien-Verein, under the conductorship of Professor Alexis Holländer. The work met with applause from the large audience which filled the hall of the Singakademie. The Dance of Reapers and Gleaners in the second part was especially appreciated.

Mr. A. Chase, the much-esteemed organist and choirmaster of St. Luke's, Nightingale Lane, Balham, will vacate his position at Christmas. Those who wish to show their appreciation of his commendable efforts for the last twenty-three years can do so by sending their subscriptions to the "Chase Testimonial Fund," of which Mr. William Bowley, Lyndon, Werter Road, Putney, is hon. secretary.

Miss May Mukle, a talented pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, gave her first violoncello recital on the 15th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. Miss Mukle played a number of pieces with sweetness of tone, expression, and power that won frequent and hearty manifestations of approval from a numerous audience; she was assisted by Miss Anita Sutherland, who sang an artistic selection of songs.

Mr. W. H. Hadow, of Worcester College, Oxford, author of "Studies in Modern Music," has written an essay on Haydn (considered as a Croatian not a German composer), which will be published shortly by Messrs. Seeley and Co. The essay will contain several pages of Croatian popular tunes compared with passages from Haydn's works.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and Dr. Lloyd, Precentor of Eton College, conducted their own compositions at the annual concert of the St. George's Chapel Choir, which took place on the 15th ult., under the direction of Sir Walter Parratt, at the Albert Institute, Windsor.

The thirteenth series of the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society will consist of three subscription concerts, to be given in the Queen's Hall, on the 6th inst.; February 8, and April 5, 1898. The orchestra will be conducted by Mr. Arthur W. Payne and the choir by Mr. A. G. Cooke.

Mr. Edgar F. Jacques has been offered and has accepted the Queen Victoria Lectureship at Trinity College, London, for the year ending June, 1898. The subject of his lectures, the dates of which are not yet fixed, will be "The psychology of musical appreciation."

The Rt. Hon. Lord Coleridge, Q.C., has been elected President of Trinity College, London, in succession to Sir Richard Webster, who has filled the office for four years. Sir Richard Webster has been elected a Vice-President.

Miss Lilian Crosby, a former winner of the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, sang two songs with much acceptance at the Sunday concert given at the Royal Albert Hall on October 31.

Mr. Godwin Fowles gave a musical lecture at the St. Stephen's Mission Hall, Poplar, on October 28. Miss Edith Shapland (a pupil of Mr. Fowles) rendered valuable assistance with her excellent soprano voice.

Mr. Edmondstoune Duncan has gained the prize of £20 recently offered in open competition for a work for wind instruments, the composition being a Quintet for flute, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and pianoforte.

The Wimbledon Male-voice Choir has successfully commenced its fourth season, under the conductorship of Mr. H. W. Weston. Mr. J. W. Townsend, Wendreda, Wimbledon Common, is the secretary.

Dr. C. J. Frost gave his ninth organ recital at the Goldsmiths' Institute, New Cross, on the 18th ult., when the programme was selected entirely from the works of Rheinberger.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—Apropos of the recent appearance here of Herren Nikisch, Richard Strauss, and other eminent musicians as conductors of the Concertgebouw concerts, M. Henri Viotta, the distinguished director of the Amsterdam Wagner Society, very sensibly remarks in Le Télégraphe: "I distinctly disapprove of this frequent changing of conductors, on account of the great divergence of artistic conception which exists amongst modern orchestral conductors. The orchestra, as a consequence, becomes perplexed as to tempi and the reading generally of the works it has to interpret, with the result that even the finest and best disciplined body of musicians will in the end forfeit some of its coherence and of confidence in its own execution."

Berlin.—Spinelli's "A basso Porto" was brought out at the Royal Opera, on October 25, as the first novelty of the season, and proved a distinct success. Herr Sucher conducted, and the composer, who was present, was the recipient of much flattering attention.——The Philharmonic Choir, under the direction of Herr Siegfried Ochs, gave its first concert of the season on the 1st ult., with an excellent performance of the music of Gluck's "Orpheus" and of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," the latter having been chosen with a special view to the fiftieth anniversary of the composer's death. Miss Landi, in the part of Orpheus, was greatly applauded, as was the distinguished baritone, Herr Scheidemantel, in Mendelssohn's cantata. Professor Reimann has resumed his very interesting weekly organ recitals in the Kaiser Wilhelm Memorial Church, which is invariably completely filled on these occasions. His repertory is a most comprehensive one, and one of his recent recitals included a magnificent rendering of the "Parsifal" Prelude and of the fantasia "Weinen, Klagen," by Liszt.——A double vocal quartet party has been formed here recently, under the direction of Herr Carl Mengewein, for the special purpose of devoting itself to the cultivation of the madrigal. The "Berlin Madrigal Society" intends giving periodical concerts both here and elsewhere.——M. Jean de Reszke is announced to appear for the first time at the Royal Opera next month, when he will sing (in German) in "Faust," "Les Huguenots," "Lohengrin," and "Siegfried."

Brunswick.—A new one-act opera, "Amen," in which the composer, Herr Bruno Heydrich, sustained the leading tenor part, was brought out with success at the Hof-Theater on October 25. Herr Heydrich, who has been engaged at this theatre for some years, is an excellent musician, having studied under Dr. Wüllner, of Cologne.

Cologne.—A new one-act opera, "The Blacksmiths' Strike," by Herr Max Joseph Beer, of Vienna, was received with much favour on its first performance, on October 25, at the Stadt-Theater. The performance was preceded by an admirable representation of Gounod's charming idyl "Philémon et Baucis."

Copenhagen.—The celebrated Norwegian poet, Björnstjerne Bjornsen, is giving a series of highly successful recitations just now, both here and in other parts of Denmark, of translations of Victor Hugo's poems. He is accompanied by his daughter, Madame Sigurd Ibsen, a highly gifted musician, who contributes pianoforte pieces and songs to these interesting recitals.

Dessau.—Herr August Klughardt's remarkable opera "Iwein" met with a most enthusiastic reception on its production, with some modifications in the score, on October 27, at the Court Theatre. There was a crowded audience and the composer, who conducted, was called for many times during the evening.

Florence.—Signor Mascagni is staying in this town just now, engaged upon completing the score of his new opera "Iris." He has lately paid a visit to Baron Krauss, at Fiesole, for the purpose of inspecting the latter's collection of Japanese and other musical instruments, one of the finest and most interesting in existence, and from which the Maëstro is said to have derived some suggestions for his Japanese opera.

Frankfort-on-Main.—M. Vincent d'Indy, the well-known French composer, has accepted an invitation to conduct his "Wallenstein" Symphony at one of the Museum concerts on the 26th ult.

Hamburg.—It is not often that a new work brought out by Director Pollini has met with such a complete fiasco as was the case with the three-act comic opera "Die fromme Helene," produced at the Stadt-Theater on October 22. Hissing and derisive laughter frequently interrupted the performance, and although the score is by no means devoid of merit (the anonymous composer is said to be Herr Adalbert von Goldschmidt, of Vienna), the work had, of course, to be withdrawn from the repertory.——Special interest attaches to the Philharmonic concerts (formerly under the direction of the late Hans von Bülow), to be given here during the present season, three of which will be conducted by MM. Lamoureux, Colonne, and Martucci, and the remainder by Herr Weingartner, of Berlin.

Leipzig.—A new opera in three acts, entitled "Die Grille," the libretto, founded upon one of George Sands' stories of rustic life, by E. Speth, the music by Johannes Doebber, was brought out for the first time at the Stadt-Theater, on October 22, and very favourably received. The composer, who is the conductor at the Coburg Court Theatre, has already written two or three other operas, and the present one, showing a distinct advance, will probably be accepted also by other German operatic managers.——Dr. Carl Reinecke has been appointed to the post of "Studien-Director" at the Conservatorium.

Liège.—M. César Thomson, the eminent violinist, has resigned his position as professor at the Conservatoire in order to secure greater liberty for himself as a virtuoso. M. Thomson has taken up his residence in Brussels, whither a number of his pupils of different nationalities have followed him.

Monaco.—A grand concert was given here on October 27, in celebration of the birth anniversary of Paganini. M. César Thomson, the excellent Belgian violinist, took part.

Moscow.—The professorship for pianoforte playing, so long vacant at the Imperial Conservatoire, has at length been filled, M. Sapellnikoff, the well-known pianist, having accepted the appointment.

Naples.—At an orchestral concert recently given here, under the direction of Signor Mugnone, an extraordinary success was scored by a Sinfonia Marinaresca by Signor Antonio Scontrino, professor of counterpoint at the Florence Conservatorio, some portions of the work being redemanded. The Sinfonia certainly appears to be of exceptional merit.

St. Petersburg.—A series of performances of Wagner's operas, it is now definitely stated, will be given by the brothers De Reszke at the Théâtre Marie in the coming spring. The conductor will probably be Dr. Muck, of Berlin, and the principal artists taking part will be Mesdames Malten, Sedlmair, Litvinne, Moran-Olden, and Olitzka; Messrs. J. and E. de Reszke, Reichmann, Dippel, and Reichenberg.—— The well-known composer, M. Rimsky-Korsakoff, has completed the score of a new opera, "Mozart and Salieri," the libretto of which is founded upon a poem by Pushkin.——A monument erected over the grave of Tschaïkowsky was unveiled on the recent fourth anniversary of the composer's death. A religious service formed part of the ceremony, at which an enormous crowd assisted. The monument, which includes a bust of Tschaïkowsky, is the work of the sculptor Kamensky.

Scheveningen.—The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which annually gives a series of concerts here during the summer months, has had a particularly brilliant season this year, at the conclusion of which the conductor, Professor Mannstaedt, besides being decorated with the order of Orange-Nassau by the Queen Regent, was the recipient of valuable presents from the Burgomaster, the managers of the Kurhaus, and others. Professor Mannstaedt has accepted the post of Capellmeister at the Royal Opera, Wiesbaden, and will be replaced in the conductorship of the Philharmonic Orchestra by Herr Rebicek.

Vienna.—One of the most salutary reforms achieved by Herr Mahler, since his recent definite appointment as the successor of Herr Jahn at the Imperial Opera, has been the total abolition of the claque, an institution which had been rampant here for many years past; in many other respects also the new director's artistic zeal and ability are already making themselves felt; notably in the care he bestows upon rehearsals of works to be produced and the regard in which he holds the intentions of their respective composers. Thus, on October 24, "Tristan und Isolde" was produced here for the first time without any curtailments, before an intensely appreciative audience; and again, on October 27, a model performance of "Die Zauberflöte" was given entirely in accordance with the original score, as performed under Mozart's direction at the Theater-an-der-Wien, without the customary alterations, and with leading artists filling even the minor parts. A similarly conscientious production of "Fidelio" is now in course of rehearsal.

OBITUARY.

A well-known musician has been removed by the very sudden death of Mr. Henry Charles Banister, which occurred at his residence, 9, Sternhold Avenue, Streatham, on the 20th ult. The son of H. J. Banister, a well-known violoncellist of his day, the deceased was born in London, June 13, 1831. He was a pupil of his father, and in 1845 competed for the King's Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music, but was beaten by a boy named Weist Hill. In the following year he was successful, and after holding the scholarship for two years was re-elected (in 1848) for a similar period. In his boyhood Mr. Banister appeared in public as a singer, taking part in duets with Miss Dolby and Miss Sabilla Novello. In this connection he was greatly interested in the results of the research made by the present writer (one of his old pupils) in discovering the reports of those boyish appearances. He also sang in a private performance of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," given at John Hullah's house, Mendelssohn himself accompanying on the pianoforte. At the Academy, Mr. Banister was a pupil for pianoforte and composition of Cipriani Potter. In 1851 he was appointed an assistant professor, and soon after professor of harmony in his Alma mater; therefore he has been teaching harmony at Tenterden Street for the long period of forty-six years! He has held similar appointments at the Guildhall School of Music since its opening (in 1880), and for sixteen years at the Royal Normal College for the Blind, where his kindly, sympathetic nature greatly endeared him to his sightless pupils. Although Mr. Banister composed four symphonies, five overtures, and many other works, he is best known by "Music," his text-book on harmony, first published in 1872, which has run through sixteen editions. He is also the author of "Musical Analysis," the "Life" of his friend Sir G. A. Macfarren, and many other musical-literary works, all showing a thoughtful and original mind. He wrote many lectures and papers, one of which on "Music and Preaching" showed his strong theological predilections. Mr. Banister's recollections of music and musicians during his long professional life were full of interest, and his death comes as a personal loss to those of his pupils who can appreciate the sterling worth of such a man as Henry Charles Banister.

With much regret we record the death of Mr. Alfred James Caldicott, which took place near Gloucester, after a distressing illness, on October 24, in his fifty-fifth year. The eldest son of a hop merchant and amateur musician at Worcester, the deceased musician was born there on November 26, 1842. Like his six brothers, he was a chorister in the Cathedral choir, and at the age of fourteen was articled to the late Mr. Done, the Cathedral organist. He subsequently entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig, where he studied under Moscheles, Hauptmann, and Plaidy. On his return to Worcester he became organist of St. Stephen's Church and to the Corporation, and also conductor of the Worcester Musical Society. In 1878 he took the degree of Bachelor in Music at the University of Cambridge, under the Professorate of Sir G. A. Macfarren. Three years later his sacred cantata "The Widow of Nain" was performed at the Worcester Musical Festival. After a short residence at Torquay in 1882, Mr. Caldicott settled in London in the following year, and was appointed a professor of harmony at the Royal College of Music. In 1885 he became musical director of the now defunct Albert Palace at Battersea. He toured with an opera company in America, 1890-91, and was conductor at the Comedy and other theatres. Mr. Caldicott is, however, best known as a composer of vocal music cast in a light vein, in which he was highly successful. For the German Reed entertainments he composed "Treasure Trove" (1883) and other operettas, thirteen in all. "John Smith" and "The Girton Girl and the Milkmaid," composed for London theatres, were of a similar nature. Two cantatas for female voices—"A Rhine Legend" and "Queen of May"—must also be mentioned. Mr. Caldicott's humorous part-songs, of which "Humpty Dumpty" (special prize, Manchester Gentlemen's Glee Society, 1878) is a highly characteristic specimen, gave the lamented composer widespread popularity.

Widespread sympathy will be felt for the veteran composer Verdi in the desolation which has entered his home, at Busseto, by the death on the 14th ult. of his devoted wife. The late Signora Giuseppina Verdi, the composer's second wife, was born at Lodi, September 18, 1815, consequently she was in her eighty-third year. She was the daughter of Felice Strepponi, a composer of local fame, and after being a pupil at the Milan Conservatorio, she made her début in January, 1835, at Trieste, in "Matilde de Shabran." She became a popular prima donna, with a beautiful voice and marvellous execution. It was through her influence that Signor Verdi gained his first hearing at La Scala with his first opera, "Oberto"; this was early in 1839, when the composer was only twenty-five years of age. Verdi thus tells the story: "The impresario of La Scala at that time was Bartolomeo Merelli. One night behind the scenes he had overheard a conversation between Signorina Strepponi and Giorgio Ronconi, a conversation in the course of which Strepponi spoke very favourably of the music of "Oberto," which Ronconi also found to his taste. I presented myself then to Merelli, who abruptly said that in consideration of the favourable opinion which he had heard expressed of my opera, he was of his own accord disposed to put it on the stage during the next season, but that if I closed with the offer I should have to make some alterations in my score, the artists who would play in it not being the same as those who were to have sung it originally. It was a brilliant offer for me—young, unknown, I came across an impresario who dared to put on the stage a new work without asking of me an indemnity of any sort; an indemnity, moreover, which it would have been quite impossible for me to raise. Merelli, taking on his own shoulders all the necessary expenses, proposed to divide with me in equal parts the sum which I should get if, in case of success, I sold my score. Let no one suppose that this was a burdensome proposition; it was the work of a beginner that was in question; and, in fact, the result turned out successful enough to induce the publisher Giovanni Ricordi to consent to acquire the ownership of my opera at the price of two thousand Austrian liri, or about £70 sterling." In 1842 Signorina Strepponi created the chief part in Verdi's "Nabucco," and after the death of the composer's first wife, more than half-a-century ago, married Verdi and retired from the stage. The deceased lady was the sweet companion of the composer's old age; she shared his joys and sorrows, triumphs and failures, and was a cherished and loving help-meet.

M. Deldevez, the once highly-esteemed and meritorious conductor of the Paris Opéra and of the Conservatoire concerts, died in Paris, on the 6th ult., in his eighty-first year. Edouard Marie Ernest Deldevez was born in the French capital in May, 1817, and studied with distinction at the Conservatoire, where he was a pupil of Habeneck, Halévy, and Berton, obtaining the first prize for violin playing and the second Prix de Rome. In 1859 he became second conductor at once of the Opéra and of the Conservatoire, succeeding to the principal post at the latter Institution in 1872, and upon the death of Hainl, in the following year, was appointed also to the principal conductorship at the Opéra. In 1876 he resigned his position at the Opéra, but remained at the head of the Conservatoire orchestra, at which Institution he also held a leading professorship until 1885.

Professor Wilhelm Heinrich von Riehl, the well-known historian of modern civilisation, whose death took place on the 16th ult., at Munich, was an accomplished musician and able musical author. In his writings on subjects connected with the art, scattered, many of them, in the feuilletons of newspapers, he was one of the first to trace the connection of the works of various composers with the general artistic and social status of the time in which they were written. A collection of these writings, in two volumes, published under the title of "Musikalische Characterköpfe," was the delight of music-lovers a generation or so ago. It went through a number of editions, and has been translated into several languages. A third volume of essays, in which the author has, however, developed a somewhat ultra-conservative tendency, was reviewed at some length in The Musical Times of 1878. Riehl was born at Biebrich, in 1823, and was appointed to a professorship at the Munich University in 1853, while in 1885 he also became Director of the National Museum and Conservator of the Monuments of Art and Antiquities in Bavaria.

John Ross, one of the most respected members of the musical profession in Liverpool, ended a most useful and successful career, on the 22nd ult., at the age of fifty-six years. As a young man he was a member of the orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera, and subsequently musical director at St. Helier's (Jersey), Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Liverpool, to which latter city he came about twenty years since. After a period spent as orchestral conductor he found such a rapidly increasing number of pupils claiming his attention that he determined to devote the whole of his time to tuition. He was one of the founders, and for some time a director, of the Liverpool College of Music; but failing health compelled him to abandon this post three years or so ago.

The death is announced of Mr. Frank Bradley, which occurred at Birmingham, on the 1st ult., at the early age of forty-four. The deceased held organ appointments at St. Barnabas, Birmingham; Stoke-on-Trent; Quebec Cathedral; Tettenhall College, Wolverhampton; St. John's, Wilton Road, London; and St. Andrew's, Kensington. Mr. Bradley toured in the United States, Australia, and South Africa, as solo organist, pianoforte recitalist, and accompanist to Mr Santley and others. He was formerly a professor of the organ at Trinity College.

A distinguished musical amateur, M. Jules Gallay, died in Paris, on the 2nd ult., at the age of seventy-five. He was an authority on all subjects connected with the history of stringed instruments. He, moreover, rendered important services to the advancement of his favourite study by the publication, partly at his own expense, of magnificent reprints, with copious commentaries, of the "Parfait Luthier," by the Abbé Sibire, and of the "Mariage de la Musique," by Guillaume de Manoir; works previously almost inaccessible to the student.

We learn with regret of the death, recently at Genoa, of Signor Carlo del Signore, the conductor of the admirable and highly successful first performance in Italy (in June last, at Genoa) of Gounod's "Mors et Vita," reported in The Musical Times. He was the director of the Civico Istituto de Musica, of Genoa, and a most earnest, conscientious artist.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On October 28, after a very short illness, at Norfolk Lodge, Barnet, Marie, the beloved wife of Charles Victor Benecke, and elder daughter of the late Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. (We refer to the late Mrs. Benecke on p. 810.)

On the 3rd ult., after six months' suffering, Charlotte, widow of the late William Makepeace, of Rochester, in her seventy-eighth year.

On the 6th ult., at 15, Broadhurst Gardens, Hampstead, Fanny, the wife of Isidor Cohn.

On October 14, at Madrid, Antonio Cano, professor at the Royal Musical Academy, guitar virtuoso, aged eighty-six.

On October 15, at Vienna, Carl Lenz, musical director and choirmaster of the Church of St. Borromæus, aged seventy-one.

On October 18, at Stockholm, Johann Isidor Dannström, popular national composer and vocalist, aged eighty-five.

On October 21, at Berlin, Paul Kuczynki, composer and pianist, aged fifty.

On October 22, at Burton Crescent, London, John Francis Borschitzky, professor of music and composer, aged seventy-six.

The Leipzig Conservatorium has lost one of its most highly esteemed teachers by the death, on October 24, at the age of seventy-three, of Professor Theodor Coccius.

On October 27, at Stuttgart, Dr. Reinhold Seyerlen, professor at the Conservatorium and organist at St. John's Church, aged forty-nine.

On October 31, at Zwickau, Otto Türke, organist of St. Mary's Church, aged sixty-five.

On the 8th ult., at Paris, J. B. Lafleurance, leading flautist at the Opéra and professor at the Conservatoire, aged sixty.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Amberley (New Zealand).—The church choir is now provided with copies of the Cathedral Psalter in place of Mercer's book. As soon as the new pointing becomes familiarised to the congregation, the great advantages and musical value of the Cathedral Psalter over the old-fashioned book so long in use will be freely recognised and enjoyed by everyone.

Barnstaple.—The re-opening, on October 27, of the Music Hall, the property of the Town Council, after thorough decoration, was worthily celebrated by two performances of Sullivan's "Golden Legend," on the same day. A very efficient orchestra and chorus did ample justice to this fine popular work. The soloists were Madame Zipporah Monteith (Elsie), Mr. J. Dean Trotter (Prince Henry), while the part of Lucifer was in the experienced hands of Mr. Watkin Mills. Miss Florence Bulleid achieved much success as Ursula and Mr. C. J. Bath, the assistant-conductor of the Society, was the Forester. Dr. H. J. Edwards, the admirable conductor of the Barnstaple Musical Festival Society, must be warmly congratulated upon the double success attendant upon an eventful day in the musical history of this quaint old town in North Devon.

Bedford.—A very successful concert was given here, on the 10th ult., by the students of the Bedford School of Music, by invitation of the principal, Mr. P. H. Diemer, in the Corn Exchange. Many of the students had been successful in gaining certificates during the year, which were presented by the Mayoress (Mrs. Wells), amidst great enthusiasm. The programme included a quartet for two pianofortes—"Te voglio bene assaye," Scharwenka; Polonaise in C sharp minor, Chopin; violin solos, (a) "Souvenir" and (b) "Valsette"; and songs. The playing from memory of "Dreams" and "Tarantelle" in succession by Master Conway was a special feature of the entertainment.

Bradford.—Miss E. A. Atkinson gave an excellent pianoforte recital at the Church Institute, on the 2nd ult., when she created a very favourable impression by her successful interpretation of a varied programme of pianoforte music by Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, Brahms, Grieg, Dvorák, Moszkowski, and other composers. Miss Atkinson was re-called several times and very heartily applauded. Mr. Alfred Jordan gave variety to a very pleasant evening by contributing some songs with much acceptance.

Brighton.—It is not surprising that a crowded audience attended the second subscription concert, held in the Dome, on October 28, of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society when the work selected for performance was Gounod's "Redemption." Full justice was done to what the composer called "The work of my life" by the excellent Society which Mr. R. Taylor so efficiently conducts, soloists, band, and chorus vieing with each other in rendering the music to the best advantage. The soloists were Miss Alice Holman, Miss Ada Watchurst, Mrs. W. J. Mobsby, Miss Hilda Taylor, Mr. Charles Hinchliff,

Mr. Boulcott Newth, Mr. Frederick Hosking, and Mr. T. H. Moppett. A word of praise must be given to Mr. Percy Starnes for the excellent manner in which he presided at the organ on the occasion of this successful concert.

Calcutta.—The Jubilee of Calcutta Cathedral was celebrated on October 8, when the Cathedral choir was assisted by all the choirs from the various churches in Calcutta, numbering altogether about 250 voices. Mr. Ernest Slater, the Cathedral organist, presided at the organ, and Mr. B. P. Willis, a member of the Cathedral choir, conducted an orchestra of strings and wind instruments. The Cathedral was crowded and the service was a great success.

Epsom.—Advantage was taken of the twenty-first anniversary of the dedication of Christ Church to present Mr. George E. Good (who has been organist and choirmaster during the whole of that period) with a handsome testimonial in the shape of a cheque for £100.

Fowey.—At a Conversazione given by members of the Fowey Choral Society, on the 17th ult., a very handsome silver plate was presented to Mr. C. E. Juleff, the conductor. Dr. Boger, in making the presentation, alluded to the high esteem in which Mr. Juleff was held by all the members of the Society. Although they deeply regretted his removal to St. John's, Taunton, he had no hesitation in saying that their loss would prove to be Taunton's gain.

Hanley.—The second Meakin concert of the ninth season was given on the 8th ult., in the Victoria Hall, when Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was performed by the Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. James Garnet. The band and chorus numbered 300 performers, and Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss Florence Hoskins, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. William Paull were the soloists.

Hawarden.—A lecture on the life and works of Franz Schubert was delivered in the Gymnasium, on the 10th ult., by Mr. Arthur Lyon, interspersed with selections from the composer's works. Miss M. James's rendering of the "The Inquirer," "Hark! hark, the lark," and "The Linden Tree" was very highly appreciated, while Mr. George Platt's fine voice left nothing to be desired in the presentation of "The Erl-King," "The Wanderer," and the ever-popular "Who is Sylvia?" The last two movements of the "Trout" Quintet and the Scherzo from the Trio in B flat were enthusiastically applauded, while a spirited rendering of the male-voice part-song, "The Hamlet," brought to a conclusion a most enjoyable evening.

Hyde (Cheshire).—Mr. Richard Knight essayed the bold experiment of giving a concert the programme of which consisted entirely of his own compositions, at the Union Street Schools, on the 9th ult. The artists were Miss Bessie Holt (soprano), Miss Annie Gregory (contralto), Mr. O. Kenworthy (tenor), Mr. Alfred Brown (baritone), Mr. James Heaton (violoncello), and Master William Faunt (violin). The St. John's choir, Godley, conducted by the Rev. Horace Stephens, also assisted, and the composer-concert-giver played all the accompaniments as well as the pianoforte solos. Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, M.P. was the chairman, and, in the course of some opening remarks, passed a eulogy upon the talent of Mr. Richard Knight.

Luton.—Special choral services were held in St. Mary's (Parish) Church on the 7th and 8th ult., in connection with the annual choir festival, when the following music was excellently rendered by the choir of the church, under the able direction of the organist, Mr. F. Gostelow: Te Deum (Gostelow in B flat), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Calkin in F); anthems, "In humble faith and holy love" (Garrett), "From Thy love as a Father" (from Gounod's "Redemption"), the solo impressively sung by Miss Foote; "Judge me, O God" (Mendelssohn), "Zadok the Priest" and "Hallelujah" (Handel). Mr. Gostelow also played some organ pieces with great acceptance.

Oswestry.—The Choral Society gave a chamber concert on the 2nd ult. The vocalists were Madame Fanny de Boufflers and Miss Maud Turner. Pianoforte, violin, and violoncello music was contributed by Dr. C. F. Reynolds (conductor of the Society), Mr. Bertie Ollerhead, and Mr. F. Collinson.

Plymouth.—Dr. Weekes is to be congratulated on the enterprise he shows in directing his choral and orchestral societies, and especially in regard to the last concert he gave, at the Guildhall, on the 10th ult. The programme was evidently chosen to suit all tastes, as it included Tschaïkowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique" and Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." Other features of the concert were Gade's chorus "Thou art mighty, O Eros," and Lemmens's part-song "Drops of rain." The vocalists were Madame Marie Duma, Miss Ethel Phillips, Miss Eveline Warren, Mr. Charles Saunders, and Mr. William Paull. Dr. Weekes conducted his well-trained forces with his usual conspicuous skill and enthusiastic zeal. Mr. John Hele presided at the organ.

Southport.—The Southport Choral Society gave its first concert this season, in the Cambridge Hall, on the 3rd ult. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Wagner selections, the latter including the Overture, "Elizabeth's Greeting," and March ("Tannhäuser"), the Introduction to Act III. and Bridal Chorus ("Lohengrin"), and the "Preislied" ("Die Meistersinger"). The soloists were Miss Florence Rhodes, Miss Jessie Rhodes, and Mr. William Green. There was an excellent band of 50 and chorus of 200 performers. Mr. J. Charles Clarke conducted a very successful concert.

Staines.—The Staines Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Martin Akerman, held a soirée musicale, at the Town Hall, on the 1st ult. The Harmonists, a male-voice quartet, consisting of Messrs. Percy Coward, Malcolm Boyle, Wilfred Kearton, and Bertram Mills, of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, contributed several selections, of which the glee "Come, sweet lass," was specially composed for the occasion by Dr. G. F. Huntley. The balance of tone and general finish of the performance of this quartet were excellent and worthy of all praise. Various part-songs were well rendered by the Society.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. A. G. Gosling, Organist and Choir Director to Berkeley Chapel, Mayfair.—Mr. Thomas B. Rutherford, Organist and Choirmaster to West Cliff Baptist Church, Bournemouth.—Mr. George F. Mountford, Organist to the Parish Church and Music-master at Wallace Hall Academy, Closeburn, Dumfriesshire.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. Lawrence White (Solo Alto), to St. Mary's, Ealing.—Mr. Charles Saunders (Solo Tenor and Choirmaster), to the New Albion Congregational Church, Ashton-under-Lyne.—Mr. Herbert Langton (Solo Tenor), to St. Andrew's, Stoke Newington.—Mr. A. W. Bonfield-Hearne, Choirmaster to the Garrison Church, Rowner, Gosport.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. M. E.—To illustrate your lecture on Swedish music you might select from the songs of Halfdan Kjerulf, and by the same composer there is an Album of pianoforte pieces edited by Berthold Tours. Other pianoforte pieces are Pianoforte Stücke (Op. 24), by Christian Sinding; Petite Suite of five pieces (with string accompaniment, or pianoforte alone), and two sets of Trois morceaux pour le piano (Op. 19 and 23), by Ole Olsen; Piano Album (nine short pieces), "Crescendo," by Per Lasson; Serenade, by Bredo Lasson; and Vivace giocoso, by L. M. Lindeman. For pianoforte duet, "Rapsodies Norvégiennes," by J. S. Svendsen, and Romanza for violin and pianoforte by the same composer. All the above may be obtained from Messrs. Novello and Co. There is an interesting collection of Swedish songs and dance-tunes arranged, with pianoforte accompaniments, by Ahlström and Boman (Stockholm, Hirsch); and another, edited by A. G. Rosenberg, and entitled "160 Polskor, Visor och Danslekar upptecknade i Södermanland, samt sattei för Pianoforte" (Stockholm, 1876, folio).

Piano.—You seem to have confused the slur as a phrasing sign in pianoforte music with its use in vocal music. The examples you give from Czerny are approximately correct, but the musical effect of the phrasing sign, staccato mark, &c., rather than mathematical accuracy, should be the first consideration. The slur marks in the other examples you send (from Dykes's tune to "Lead, kindly Light") naturally indicate the manner in which the notes are to be apportioned to the various syllables. To sing the passages in the way you have indicated would be to caricature Newman's lines. "Lead Thou me on," for instance, must be sung in one breath; to sing "ask (break) to (break) see," because the two notes to each syllable are slurred, would be absurd. The intelligent interpretation of the words should have the pre-eminence in all such cases.

P. L.—The "book" of Haydn's "Creation" is said to have been intended for an oratorio by Handel. The selection of the words, from Genesis and "Paradise Lost," is attributed to a Mr. Lidley, or Liddell. Baron von Swieten translated the libretto, with considerable additions, into German, and the result was "Die Schöpfung," or "The Creation." The Baron re-translated the German into English again, with results that are not always edifying.

Musicus.—In reply to your question as to "the date, month, and year when the first ten scholarships of the National Training School of Music, Kensington, were awarded," it is difficult to say which were "the first ten." The ten scholarships given by the Corporation of London were competed for on April 24, 1876. The School was opened on May 18, 1876; perhaps this date is near enough for you; if not, write again giving more details.

A. L.—A list of all the songs and passages in Shakespeare which have been set to music is published by Trübner and Co. for the New Shakespere Society. See also "A Handbook of Shakespeare Music," by A. Roffe (Chatto and Windus). Messrs. Novello and Co. issue a catalogue of the Shakespeare songs published by them, which may be obtained gratis on application.

Thistle.—(1) We know of no such a book as Lavoix's "Histoire de l'instrumentation" in our language. Other subjects—e.g., Psalm Tunes, Chanting, Oratorio, also lack concise, readable, and accurate histories. (2) We cannot give an opinion on the instrument you refer to.

E. M. B.—For the metronomic rates of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue for the pianoforte in D (Op. 35), you may adopt—Prelude ♩ = 84, Fugue ♩ = 96.

A. P.—You had better send the flute to some reliable makers, such as Boosey and Co. or Rudall and Co., and ask their opinion upon the subject.

WRITTEN BY THE

REV. W. CUNLIFFE

TUNE BY

1.

O GOD, our Father, in compassion hear
Our prayer to Thee, and in Thy love draw near;
Forgive our sin, and ever with us stay
In cloud or sunshine through the live-long day.

Come, Lord, and bless this Parish with the grace
Which helps Thy children in the Christian race:
Breathe on dead souls, and rouse them into life;
Give courage, hope, and conquest in the strife.

3.

Prevent the young: their faltering footsteps guide,
And for their weakness heavenly help provide;
Be Thou their strength, as years on years increase,
And to the aged give Thy heavenly peace.

Let all our brethren in this Parish feel
That Thou, alone, canst all our evils heal:
Draw them to seek Thee in Thy House of Prayer,
And to Thy footstool all their burdens bear.

Our clergy bless, and teach them souls to win,
To guide the wanderers from the paths of sin:
Give them their people's love, and reverence due;
And, when downcast, their fading hopes renew.

Make us receive their message, which is Thine,
And clothe the Living Word with power Divine:
And to our souls do Thou Thyself present,
As we partake the Holy Sacrament.

7.

Bless all who labour in Thy sacred cause
With loyal hearts to teach Thy holy laws;
Give them Thy light, without which all is night,
Till faith and hope be lost in perfect sight.

Dear Father, by Thy Spirit help us now
With deep humility the knee to bow;
And when, at last, of death we cross the ford,
Take us to dwell with Thee, through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Price Three-Halfpence. Words only, price 2s. 6d. per 100.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

FOURTH AND FIFTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"'Una' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Ninth and Tenth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twentieth to Twenty-fifth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

†ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, *7s. 6d.; †5s. per 100.

EDWARD ELGAR.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.
String Parts (in the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

The composer has recently made remarkable strides in popular estimation, and in his latest work those characteristics of originality, force, and skill which have procured him his position are fully maintained. . . . The whole service is one of remarkable beauty and individuality.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. Elgar's new settings of most familiar texts are quite of a festal character, having but little in common with what may be called the traditional, and still orthodox, form and spirit of English Church music. . . . Happy, as I think, in their construction, these pieces are perhaps even more fortunate in the power and value of their expression. The composer is not, as Wagner said of Berlioz, crushed by the ruins of his own machines. They may be more elaborate than is usual in such a case, but they come to no grief, and involve their inventor in none. Every force is directed straight to the end of expression, which shall be appropriate, powerful, and clear. I cannot say that the mark is ever absolutely missed, and I must express an opinion that it is generally hit plumb in the centre. To my mind, indeed, the new works are a succession of effects which more and more absorb attention, and more and more tend to the conviction that one is hearing music in which are some at least of the elements of greatness. . . . Mr. Elgar's new compositions are, of their kind, masterpieces, and such as compel me to await the further development of the Malvern musician's career with augmented confidence.

MORNING POST.

It is a masterly work. The theme which opens the orchestral introduction, and on which the composition may be said to be built, is striking and powerful, and it is subsequently treated in a most skilful and effective manner. The voices are much used in unison against this initial theme given out by the orchestra, but in several places they are written for in four parts, unaccompanied, with beautiful effect. There are also some well-conceived imitatory vocal passages, and now and again the voices are in five and six parts. Great intensity of emotion marks the setting of the intercessory portions of the hymn, and the announcement of the final words is most impressive. . . . The music allied to the Benedictus is naturally more suave and flowing than that written for the Te Deum, but the themes of the latter are cleverly utilised in the former, and with such deft alterations in tempo and treatment that the music finely expresses the spirit of blessing and peace which pervades the text.

STANDARD.

The Te Deum opens with a figure which is used with such persistency that the listener is reminded of the methods of Dvorák. Other themes are, of course, introduced, and the whole feeling of the composition is dramatic, with masterly part-writing for the voices and glowing orchestration. . . . Mr. Elgar's masterly work is equally suitable for the church and the concert-room, and it should be heard in London at the earliest opportunity.

PREFACE.

The words of these Four-and-Twenty little Songs have been selected from Mr. Norman Gale's delightful volume of Children's Poems. A few modifications of the original text have been made in order to facilitate their musical rendering.

Though in the first instance, no doubt, the songs will be mainly sung to children rather than by them, the Composer's aim has been to observe such conditions in his settings as to make it easy for children to join in singing them themselves. With this object he has endeavoured to furnish simple, rhythmical melodies of a suitable compass, and it will be found that in the case of sixteen out of the twenty-four songs the vocal range is confined to the octave, whilst in only three instances does it exceed nine notes.

TECHNIQUE
BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

This book is the result of an endeavour to set down my ideas in a systematic form, and I put it forth in the hope that it may prove of service to some of my fellow-teachers, as likewise to any earnest student of the pianoforte who may be led by his interest in the subject to read what I have written.

BY
GEORGE GROVE, C.B.

PRICE, CLOTH, GILT, SIX SHILLINGS.

"I recognise it, without the smallest hesitation, as one of the most important and valuable among recent contributions to musical literature. . . . The best informed of professional musicians may learn a great deal about the master-works of Beethoven from Sir George Grove, whose wide reading and acute perceptiveness have enabled him to marshal an astonishing array of facts, and whose intimate acquaintance with the spirit of the master has qualified him to throw light upon pages which, to many, are still obscure. . . . I must be satisfied with the remarks already made, earnestly recommending all who recognise Beethoven's greatness as shown in his immortal Symphonies to obtain Sir George Grove's volume, and walk in the luminous paths through which he is ready to conduct all who trust his guidance."—Daily Telegraph.
